THE FALL OF PHAETON.

With a beautiful Engraving, designed by Mr. Cooper, and engraved by Mr. Scott.

THE Fall of Phaeton, which is the subject of the frontispiece for the present volume, is thus described in the books of the Heathen Mythology:—

"Phaeton was son of Apollo, and the nymph Clymene. In a dispute with Epaphus, son of Jupiter and Io, the latter upbraided Phaeton with not being the son of Apollo, alledging that his mother only made use of that pretence to cover her infamy. Phaeton flew to his mother, and by her advice carried his complaint to Phœbus (i. e. Apollo), who received him with great tenderness, and, to allay his disquietude, swore by Styx to grant whatever he requested, as a proof that he acknowledged him as his son. Phaeton demanded the direction of the Chariot of the Sun for one day. The father, surprised and grieved at the request, dissuaded him from the attempt, but in vain. Being, by his oath, reduced to the necessity of submitting, the God entrusted Phaeton with the reins. After directing him how to use them, the horses, not finding their usual conductor, ran precipitately along, and the charioteer, becoming dazzled with the light from above, frighted with the abyss below, and terrified in his career,

reer, let go the reins, and lost both his judgment and his way: In this dilemma, Jupiter, to prevent setting the world on fire, was obliged, by his thunderbolt, to hurl Phaeton from his seat into the river Po, where his sisters mourned his unhappy end, and were afterwards changed into poplars, by Jupiter.

A CONSTANT READER.

AT half past one p. m. on the 15th of October, 1811, Duncan Cameron, the trusty keeper of Glenartney Forest, summoned  from the lodge, for the purpose of shooting a stag. The weather was wet and tempestuous, and it became necessary to wrap the locks of the double-barrelled fowling-piece with many folds of a plaid, to secure them from the rain. The view of some deer at a distance obliged  to abandon his horse, and leave him with a groom, in a state of concealment. Duncan and Donald, his young kilted associate, conducted  with great silence into the neighbourhood of a numerous herd, in which were many noble harts, but the Highland sheep, by their movements, gave intimation to the deer of the approach of man, so that the whole party trotted to the nearest eminences, and soon after, from the ridges of the lofty mountains, disappeared.

This primary effort having failed, it became the sportsmen, as the hour had gone three, to look out for game, or abandon their design for the evening. At this moment a gust of wind from the west dispersed the haze, and a stag, attended by some does, was discovered, through a glass, browzing on an eminence about a mile and a half distant, beyond a rapid torrent.—This attraction gained instant attention, and again enlivened every countenance and breast. Across the low grounds and small burns, a favourable passage, amidst the greatest silence, was found out, to the intervening water, and the torrent did not long delay the chase.

The address of the keepers, and the return of the mist, equally contributed to delay the arrival of  on the verge of the hill, over the west of which he discovered the amorous and lusty stag in an undisturbed state, and almost regardless of his approach. Although the distance exceeded two hundred yards, a decisive effort was now necessary, as any further attempt to lessen the interval might have occasioned alarm, and consequently would have diminished the hope of a favourable result. The rapidity of the motion, and the inequalities of the ground, had not, fortunately for , produced any unevenness of pulse, and the trigger met a firm and even pressure. The first shot broke a fore leg of the stag, near the shoulder; the second penetrated through the lower part of his chest.

Notwithstanding the severity of the wounds, the noble animal did not fall, as was generally expected; but proceeding down the hill, he crossed the stream, and caused considerable apprehension in his pursuers, by the manner in which he climbed the opposite mountain.—Two large lurchers were instantly put upon the track, and, owing to the subtlety and active perseverance of of Canto and his companion, the stag was again brought into the stream. He crossed and re-crossed it several times, but as the dogs were afraid of him, and the evening was fast advancing, it was lucky for his adversaries that he constantly held a course towards the lodge.

At this juncture, however, it was judged expedient to endeavour to bring the scene to a conclusion, lest the obscurity of the night, or the large flood of the Ruchel, into which the torrent falls, might eventually deprive  of his magnificent game. The striking necessity for acting decisively, and the fervor occasioned by the pursuit, stifled all remorse as to another attempt; and whilst the stag was mounting a rugged bank, he took a deliberate aim within ten paces of his front. The gun missed fire, owing to the moisture of the evening, and happily for , the stag retreated into the water. The remaining strength and activity of the animal carried him another mile down the country, and he entered the foaming Ruchel, within a short distance of the hospitable mansion. The conspicuous manner of his approach, the gallant challenge of his pursuers, and the echo of the rocks and caverns, had assembled both the inmates and domestics of the lodge, and the cottagers of all ages and descriptions, within the precincts of Glenartney. The Highland women and children vied with the masculine inhabitants of this picturesque scenery, as well in demonstrations of joy, as activity of movement.

At this period the safety of the prize was not evident, nor the spectacle, though triumphant, satisfactory. The stag stood proudly at bay within the bank, the dogs did not dare to touch him, the torrent was deep and loud, the opposite mountains were near, and night was coming on. Under these circumstances, after adjusting the gun,  became a reluctant executioner. By the advice of Duncan, he aimed, from an eminence, what he hoped would have terminated the sufferings of the fearless and gallant stag: but a motion of his head thwarted the intent of the first fire, and it remained for the second ball to break the centre rib, and enter the body. Even this mortal discomfiture did not bring him down; he plunged into the middle of the torrent, and his magnificent antlers and limbs made their appearance alternately, amidst water, and rocks, and foam. The brave young Donald ventured into the eddies, and with equal courage and address, towed the slain hart to the bank. The applauding Highlanders raised him from the river, and bore him on their shoulders, in triumph, to the lodge.

IRISH SPORTING.

A Match has been lately made, which is likely to excite as much interest in the sister kingdom, as the well-known race between the two celebrated horses Hambletonian and Diamond did at Newmarket in March, 1799.—It is between the Marquis of Sligo's (late the Duke of Grafton's Pope, and Mr. Bruen's (late Colonel Loftus's) Holyhock, to be run next October, at Armagh, four miles, for 2000gs. —Great betting has taken place, and many thousands are depending. —Holyhock, for the last two years, has been the leading horse at the Curragh, and Pope is well-known at Newmarket.

Holyhock was got by Master Bagot; his dam by North-Star; grandam by Dorimant, out of a daughter of Mr. Ripton's Sharper. —Master Bagot was got by Old Bagot, out of the late Mr. O'Kelly's Harmonia, own sister to Soldier and St. George's dam, by Eclipse.—Holyhock won once in 1808, five times in 1809, thirteen times in 1810, and six times in 1811, ten of which were Royal Plates, and not 14, which has been erroneously stated.

Pope was bred by the late Duke of Grafton, and got by Waxy, out of Prunella, whose death was announced in our Sporting Intelligence for January last.—He was a winner of the Derby, and 15 other stakes, &c.

SPORTING BIOGRAPHY.

ON Saturday, the 7th inst. died, after a few days illness, in his 50th year, at Minskip Lodge, near Boroughbridge, Yorkshire, after a short illness, William Fletcher, Esq. universally respected: a character well known upon the turf, and owner and breeder of Trimbush, Compass, Camperdown, Malta, Harefoot, Esther, Miss Staveley, Minskip, Staveley-Lass, Sligo, and of that well-known good runner, and now a stallion, Staveley, who won the St. Leger Stakes in 1805.—It is somewhat remarkable, that the own brother to Staveley, Sligo, &c. a very promising colt, rising two years old, died on the same day of his owner, Mr. Fletcher, who, we understand, was to have been married on the 9th instant.

On Saturday, Feb. 29, at Croydon, Surrey, John Stapleton, Esq. late of Clints, near Richmond, Yorkshire.—A gentleman much respected on the turf, and owner of Fair Susannah, the dam of Tom Wheatley, by Pipator; Master Betty, by Delpini; Tumbler, by Don Quixote, and several others.

DISPUTES
BETWEEN GENTLEMEN,
On Points of Honour, &c. &c.

IT was our intention to have given the documents, and subjoined some reflections, on the existing dispute between the Magistrates of Bury and Captain Benjafield, but an occurrence has taken place that might bring upon us the charge of anticipation, were we now to enter on the subject. Whenever it is taken up, it will be treated with candour and impartiality, and a scrupulous adherence to the admonition of the great Poet—

"Nothing extenuate, nor set down aught in malice."

SPORTING LAW CASES,
Tried at the late Spring Assizes.

LINCOLNSHIRE.

Johnson v. Theaker.

THIS was an action under the game laws, to recover the penalty against the defendant for shooting without having a qualification.—The plaintiff is Lord of the Manor of Epworth; and it was stated that he gave a considerable range to sportsmen, keeping only certain preserves to himself; but, notwithstanding this indulgence, the defendant trespassed in defiance of notices, and compelled Mr. Johnson to resort to the present mode of repelling his incursions. The fact of shooting, on the 19th of October last, was proved. The defence relied on was, that the defendant was possessed of a landed estate of thirty-four acres in Belton, which gave him a qualification, being worth to let 100l. per annum and upwards. Three witnesses declared they would give 3l. 10s. an acre for the land in question; and one that he would take the land at a rent of 120l. a year. Mr. John Hoyle was called: he had surveyed the defendant's land, it measured 33A. 2R. 7P. He also produced the property tax assessment duplicate; cate; in which the defendant's return as owner and occupier of the land in question was only 30l. 3s. —The Judge, addressing himself to Serjeant Vaughan, counsel for the defendant, said "the return is against you." To which Mr. Clarke, for the plaintiff, added, "I know that has been held to be conclusive." Serjeant Vaughan and Mr. Reader controverted this, and maintained that the property return was "conclusive only where there was no evidence to the contrary," and that it would be to give the return, which was not made on oath, too much importance, to set it up against the testimony of three respectable witnesses on oath.—The Judge thought it was not consistent with justice to endure that a person should for the purposes of burthen rate himself at 30l. 3s.; and for the purpose of privilege, at more than three times that sum.—If it had not been for the property return, he should have felt it right to advise the Jury to find a verdict for the defendant; but the justice of the case now prevented him; he could not conscientiously get over the defendant's own declaration made in the return, which was expressly required in the printed notice to be at an estimate of the rack-rent of the property. If the defendant's property was really worth 100l. a year, he might amend his property return and get his qualification; but as long as he returned it at 30l. a year, it was too much to require of a Jury for his pleasure to call it more than three times that sum.—The Jury retired to consider of their verdict; and after ten minutes consideration found for the plaintiff.

Goulder v. Atkinson.

This was an action for a penalty under the game laws, similar to one which had been before tried at these assizes. The defendant proved a full qualification in land conveyed to him from his father in Gedney, Sutton St. James, and Fleet; and there was no property return produced in this case.—plaintiff nonsuited.

Dymoke v. Allenby.

This was an action for trespass, committed on the 7th of November, by the defendant's dogs running over the preserves of the plaintiff in Scrivelsby, defendant himself standing on the verge of the contiguous manor of Mareham and viewing the trespass.—Verdict for plaintiff, damages one farthing. The Judge expressed a doubt whether he should certify (without his doing which the damages do not carry costs.)

HAMPSHIRE.

Chopman v. Harris.

This action was brought to recover 70l. money deposited in the hands of the defendant, in part of 200l. for a wager, about the plaintiff's running a foot race for the space of one hundred and twenty yards. The like sum was deposited in the hands of another person by his opponent. The parties were to meet at the Bear Inn, Gosport, at seven o'clock, on the 2d of October, to make good the deposit. The plaintiff attended to make good his stake of 200l. but the defendant observed he was behind time and that he had forfeited the wager. An agreement, in writing, was placed in the hands of the defendant, which was produced by his counsel, but it not being on an agreement agreement stamp, the plaintiff was nonsuited.

Durant v. Assignees of Hooper, a Bankrupt.

This was an action brought by the plaintiff to recover the amount of a horse sold by the Assignees.—It appeared that the plaintiff was a friend and acquaintance of Mr. Hooper, and hearing of his misfortune sent him a horse, and expressed himself sorry at his situation. The plaintiff contended, that the horse was lent to Mr. Hooper after he committed the act of bankruptcy. It was, however, ascertained, on the evidence of the defendant's witnesses, that Mr. Hooper was in possession of the horse for some considerable time before and after he so became a bankrupt, but the horse was sent away about the time of the suing out the commission, merely to avoid its being sold.—The Jury accordingly found a verdict for defendants.

CAMBRIDGE.

Plum v. Duberry.

This was opened by stating, that an information was in the Crown-Office against defendant, for not being qualified to kill game, and having a hare in his possession; and it was clearly proved by the evidence of one Wright, an inn-keeper at Saffron Walden, that the defendant is a notorious poacher, as also of his having sold the hare in question; he brought the hare upon his back in a bag, and Plum the plaintiff, who is keeper to Lord Braybrooke, took it off his back, and asked the defendant how he came by it, to which he observed, he found it on the road. Justice Heath immediately directed the Jury to find the defendant Guilty.

Barrick v. Wilden.

This action was brought to recover the sum of 50l. paid for a horse which turned out to be unsound. The plaintiff is a horse dealer, and the defendant a farmer. The defence was completely contradictory. The Judge in his address to the Jury stated, that as no evidence was produced on the part of the plaintiff as to the tender of the horse to defendant, they would find a verdict for plaintiff, 20l. and the plaintiff to keep the horse.

SUSSEX.

Bristow v. Reeks.

This was an action on the game laws, for killing a pheasant out of season, viz. on the 3d of September.

Mr. Garrow, for the plaintiff, stated, that the defendant was a clerk in the Customs, who, in company with another cockney sportsman, thought proper to come down to this country with their double-barrelled guns, and scour the country in a poacher-like manner, depriving the country gentlemen of their fair sport and amusement. He stated that he should call an honest husbandman, who was going to his labour at sun-rise, and saw the defendant shoot at a cock pheasant on the 3d of September. He saw the bird fall, and he also saw the two persons go into the shaw and pick up something, but he could not say it was the bird. The witness would also be able to identify the person of the defendant, because he was gifted with an agreeable squint, which gave a marked character to his face.

The witness was accordingly called, who swore he saw the defendant fendant shoot a young cock pheasant at Iford, near Charlwood, on the morning of the 3d of September.

Mr. Serjeant Shepherd, for the defendant, said, he should shew that the witness was mistaken, as to the person of the defendant, and that it was one Davis, his companion, who shot the bird, and not the defendant.

Davis was accordingly called, and he swore, that he shot the bird, and not the defendant; that it rose before him, and being taken by surprise, he shot at it and killed it before he was aware that it was a pheasant. He underwent a severe cross-examination from Mr. Garrow, but the Jury found a verdict for the defendant.

MEMOIR

MEMOIR OF

MIRZA ABUL HASSAN,

Late Persian Ambassador to this Country;

With Particulars and Anecdotes of him during his Voyage from Persia.

From Morier's Journey through Persia.

MIRZA Abul Hassan was born at Shiraz in the year of the Hejera 1190, or 1776 of the Christian Æra. He was the second son of Mirza Mahomed Ali, a man famous in Persia as an accomplished scholar, and who was one of the Chief Secretaries and Mirzas of the celebrated Nadir Shah. His father's services had nearly been requited by an ignominious and cruel death, when the hand of Providence interposed for his safety, to strike with more severity the head of his atrocious master. Nadir Shah, in one of those paroxysms of cruelty so common to him during the latter years of his life, ordered that Mirza Mahomed Ali should be burnt alive, together with two Hindoos, who also had incurred his displeasure. The unfortunate Mirza, on hearing his sentence, remonstrated with the tyrant, entreating him that he might at least be permitted to die alone; and that his last moments might not be polluted by the society of men, who were of a different faith from his own, and on whom he had been taught to look with a religious abhorrence. To this the Shah consented, remitting his death until the next morning, whilst the Hindoos suffered in that same hour. That very night Nadir Shah was assassinated in his tent, and Mirza Mahomed Ali was saved.

The family of Mirza Abul Hassan rose to its greatest power during the reign of Aga Mohamed Shah, predecessor to the present King. The Mirza's father died in the service of Kerim Khan; his uncle Hajee Ibrahim Khan (uncle by his mother's side), attained the post of Prime Vizier, whilst himself and the other branches of his family enjoyed the greatest share in the administration of the affairs of the state. It was somewhat before the death of Aga Mohamed Shah, that Hajee Ibrahim bestowed his daughter in marriage on his nephew, after a long and singular courtship. A sister of his wife's is married to Mahomed Taki Mirza, one of the King's sons; and a second to the Ameen-ed-Doulah, the second Vizier.

The family, however, was not always prosperous; after some time the King ordered Hajee Ibrahim to be put to death, his relations to be seized, his wives to be sold, and his property to be confiscated. His nephews of course partook of the disaster; one was deprived of his sight, and remains to this day at Shiraz; the youngest, then twenty years of age, died under the bastinado; and the second, Mirza Abul Hassan, who was then the Governor of Shooster, was dragged to the capital as a prisoner. The circumstances of his seizure and escape from death are better described in his own words. He told me, "I was asleep when the King's officers entered into my room: they seized me, stripped me of my clothes, and, tying my hands behind my back, dragged me to Koom, where the King then was; treating me during the march with all the rigour and intemperance that generally befals a man in disgrace. The moment I reached Koom, the King pronounced the order for my execution; I was already on my knees, my neck was made bare, and the executioner had had unsheathed his sword to sever my head from my body, when the hand of the Almighty interposed, and a messenger in great haste announced my reprieve. I was indebted for my life to a man who had known me from my boyhood, and who had long cherished me as his son. This worthy man, by name Mirza Reza Kouli, the moment he heard sentence of death passed upon me, threw himself at the feet of the King, and, pleading my youth and inoffensiveness, entreated that I might be pardoned. The King yielded to his entreaties; my pardon was announced; and I still live to praise the Almighty for his great goodness and commiseration towards me."

After his providential escape, Mirza Abul Hassan, (fearing that the King might repent of his lenity towards him) fled from his country, although he had received his Majesty's order to go to Shiraz, and to remain there: he left Persia with the determination of never more returning, until the disgraces of his family had been obliterated, and until the wrath of the King against him had entirely subsided. He fled first to Shooster, the city in which he had so recently been all-powerful; and there he experienced the hospitality for which the Arabs are so justly renowned. As his administration had been lenient and temperate, he found a host of friends ready to relieve him; and on quitting Shooster, miserable and destitute of even the common necessaries of life, the inhabitants came to him in a crowd and forced seven thousand piastres upon him. From Shooster he went to Bussora, he then crossed through the heart of Arabia, frequently obliged to proceed on foot, for want of an animal to carry him, until he reached Mecca. On this journey he visited Deriyéh, the capital of Abdul Assiz, the then chief of the Wahabees. From Mecca he went to Medina; and having performed all the devotions of a pilgrim he returned to Bussora. At Bussora he learnt that the King was still inveterate against his family; and, finding an English ship on the point of sailing for India, he embarked on board of her, and shortly after reached Calcutta, at the time when the Marquis of Wellesley was Governor-General of India. From Calcutta he went to Moorshedabad, then to Hyderabad, Poonah, and Bombay; having remained altogether about two years and a half in India. At Bombay he received a firman from the King to return to Persia; by which he was assured of the King's forgiveness, and of his having been received into favour. He obeyed the firman, and ever since has enjoyed the royal protection. He has not, indeed, occupied any specific post under government, but has been the Homme d' Affaires to his brother-in-law the Ameen-ed-Doulah, second Vizier and Lord Treasurer, by which means he has been continually in active and useful life, until he was nominated the King of Persia's Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of England.

Anecdotes which occurred during the Ambassador's Residence at Constantinople, and his Voyage from thence to England.

In a short time after my (Mr. Morier's) arrival, the Persian Envoy and suite rejoined me at Constantinople. The splendour of the scenery, and the great novelty of every object about that city, did not seem to strike them with the surprise surprise that I had expected. Few people are more sensible than they are to any thing that is new and extraordinary; and few more curious and inquisitive. I could therefore only attribute their apparent indifference to the downright jealousy which they entertain of the Turks. Often when (struck with the beauties of the very fine tracts of country which we were passing) I have attempted to make them join in my feelings of admiration, they merely yielded a cool assent; always endeavouring to lessen my ardour by saying, "what is the use of such a country if it be without order?" And they considered almost as a gross national insult any comparison between the arid, unshaded mountains of Persia, and the splendid foliage and rich vegetation of the Turkish dominions. As, however, they were very keenly alive to the beauties of nature, and enjoyed much the shade of trees and the refreshing sound of running water; and as such spots occurred constantly during the course of our journey, they could not restrain their expressions of delight, though they always added at the same time, "What a pity this charming country is in the hands of these people! If we had it, (and God grant we shall) what a paradise it would be."

I frequently visited the Mirza Abul Hassan at Scutari. The windows of his apartment had a fine view of the great extent of Constantinople, the Seraglio point, the shipping in the harbour, the palaces of Dolma Baghche, and part of the Sultan's fleet, (consisting of two three-deckers, and five seventy-fours, at their anchorage) and all the activity spread over the Bosphorus by the numerous vessels of all descriptions, rowing about in every direction, altogether forming the most beautiful picture that an imagination the most fertile could picture to itself, and contrasted in the strongest manner with the misery, dulness, and sterility, of Teheran and its surrounding scenery. Whenever I called his attention to it, he seemed to shrink from the observation; and if I talked of the Turkish fleet, he said, "who can look at any ships after he has seen English ships?" Indeed, he was so little disposed to compliment the Turks, that when the Caimakan, being desirous to inspire him with a grand idea of the naval force of the Sultan, sent a Turkish officer to conduct him near the fleet, the Persian replied, "I have seen English ships much finer than any thing that you can shew me."

Yet in cases where no national jealousy intervened, whenever hospitality and kindness were shewn the Persian, I must do him the justice to add, that he never omitted to make the strongest acknowledgments of them; and, I believe, the fullest returns in his power. The most trifling attention never appeared, from the general conversation and temper of him or his people, to be thrown away upon them. The Envoy always spoke in raptures of the kindnesses which he had received in India, mentioning the names of his friends every time with an increased delight, and apparently with an unfeigned sincerity.

During the Mirza's residence at Constantinople, he was invited by Mr. Adair to an entertainment, given on the occasion, and consisting of a dinner under tents at the Buyukderé meadow, and a ball and supper at night, in a house borrowed for the purpose. The Mirza did not seem at all astonished at the introduction of ladies into the society of men, as he had already witnessed our customs in the English settlements in India: but his attendants, who had just left the very innermost parts of Persia, by one common consent collected themselves together in a corner, and eyed every thing with the most anxious astonishment and attention. Their natural loquacity seemed to have quite forsaken them, and they sat with their mouths wide open, and eyes full-staring, and uttered not a single word.

K k 2 intro-

When the hour of dancing arrived, the Mirza entered the ball-room, escorted by all his servants. There his people were more than ever in amaze, particularly when the whole assembly was in motion. Of all the dances the Waltz excited the most wonder and perhaps apprehension, for one of them quietly asked my servant in Turkish, "Pray does any thing ensue after all this?"

In the national character of the Persian, the most striking difference from that of the Turk is perhaps the facility with which he adopts foreign manners and customs. I remarked two instances during our stay at Constantinople: the first occurred one morning when I went to visit the Mirza, where one of his servants took off his cap and saluted me by a bow in our fashion: again, at a ball, several of his attendants took off their caps and sat bald-headed, from the supposition that it was disrespectful in European company to keep the head covered, whilst they saw every one uncovered. There were many other accommodations to our usages which would never have been yielded by a Turk; such as eating with knives and forks, sitting at table, drinking wine, &c. The Mirza himself told me, that when he was in Calcutta, he wore leather-breeches and boots. I am sure, then, that if the Persians had possessed as much communication with Europeans as the Turks have had, they would at this day not only have adopted many of our customs, but, with their natural quickness, would have rivalled us in our own arts and sciences. Unlike the Turks, they never scruple to acknowledge our superiority, always however reserving to themselves the second place after the English in the list of nations: whereas the Turk, too proud, too obstinate, and too ignorant to confess his own inferiority, spurns at the introduction of any improvement with equal disdain from any nation.

The great changes that are now making in the military system in Persia, particularly by the Prince Royal in Aderbigian, will in a very short time so much influence the general character and disposition of the people, that they will scarcely be recognizable. Ever since their late wars with Russia, and their political connections with Europe, the effect produced has been most striking: and a person of excellent authority, who was in Persia during the time of Kerim Khan, affirmed, in my hearing, that the nation could scarcely be considered the same.

From Constantinople we went to Smyrna, where we remained till we quitted Turkey. On the 7th of September, 1809, the Mirza and his servants went on board the Success, Captain Ayscough, to proceed to England. The people of Smyrna gathered in crowds to see him. The yards were manned; and he was honoured with a salute of fifteen teen guns, which (as soon at least as it was over) gave him no little satisfaction.

He soon accommodated himself to the manner of a ship, sleeping in a cot, and eating with a knife and fork. He did not miss a single opportunity of informing himself on every thing which he saw on board; and whatever he learned, he carefully noted in a book. His attendants seldom complained, except sometimes of the badness of the water, the hardness of the biscuit, and the want of fruit. I was struck with their natural ignorance of relative distance; they had been ever accustomed to calculate distance by menzils or day's journies; and they were surprised to find it impossible to continue such reckoning. A world of water seemed to them incomprehensible; and one of them gravely said to me—"This is quite extraordinary: this country of your's is nothing but water."

The Persians were particularly astonished, that women and little boys went to sea. The Mirza seeing some women on board the Success, exclaimed, "Is it possible! if I were to tell our women in Persia that there were women in ships, they would never believe me. To go from one town to another is considered a great undertaking amongst them; but here your women go from one end of the world to the other, and think nothing of it. If it were even known in my family that I was now in a ship and on the great seas, there would be nothing but wailings and lamentations from morning to night."

Among the many things which struck the Persians as extraordinary on board the ship, was the business of signals. They looked very much inclined to believe, that I was telling them untruths, when I said, that at two fursungs distance they might ask any questions from another ship, and receive an immediate answer: and that when we should reach England, our arrival would be known in London in ten minutes, and every necessary order returned before we could get out of the ship. All these things the Mirza carefully noted down in his book, ever exclaiming, "God grant that all such things may take place in my country too?"

When we arrived at Malta we were not permitted to land on account of the quarantine; a very mortifying prohibition to the Persians, who had no greater wish than to set foot once again on shore. I could make the Envoy indeed comprehend the nature of the quarantine laws; but his people were not so tractable, and frequently suggested their fears to him, that he might not be allowed to land even in England. He spoke seriously to me:—"It is well that I have already seen your countrymen, and know many of their regulations; for, if any other Persian had been in my place he would have required instantly to return back to his own country." They were much delighted with the exterior of Malta; and particularly with the quantity of shipping in the port. On the left of the harbour, there is a very fine building begun by Bonaparte, intended as a hospital. They seemed mightily astonished that so superb a building should be the habitation of the sick.

Those, indeed, who have been accustomed to live under an arbitrary government, and to see acts of despotism committed every day, look with contempt, rather than with admiration, upon the establishments of a free and liberal government; government; and ridicule objects by which the promoter apparently and directly gains nothing.

We talked of female dress. I asked the Envoy what effect the visit of an European woman dressed in her own way would produce in Persia. He replied, that "if the King were to see her, he would probably order all his Harem to adopt the costume, and that every other man would follow his example, and enforce a fashion, which is not only so much more beautiful, but so much less expensive than their own. Their women are clothed in brocade and gold cloth, which is soon spoilt; or at least which is always cast off, whenever they hear that a new cargo arrives from Russia."

I asked him if he had seen any handsome women in Constantinople: he replied, that he had seen none as beautiful as those of Persia. "They were fair indeed, but they wanted that carnation on their cheeks, which is called the numuck or salt of beauty; and which is the second requisite of female perfection. The first is large black eyes with brows very much arched." A tame antelope was then playing about the cabin close to me, when the Mirza said, "Do your poets ever use the simile so constantly applied by ours, 'eyes like the stag?' The frequency of that image will prove the value which we attach to the object."

I desired him to tell me the principal occupations of the women in the Harem. He complied: "They sew, embroider, and spin: they make their own clothes; and my wife even used to make mine: besides that, they superintend all the domestic concerns of the house: they keep an account of the daily expences; distribute provisions to the servants; pay their wages; settle all disputes between them; manage the concerns of the stable; see that the horses have their corn; and, in short, have the care of all the disbursements of the house. The King's mother had more business than can be described. She had the controul of all her son's Harem, which might consist altogether of more than a thousand women: and you may well conceive the trouble which they could give." When I suggested the difficulty of a woman transacting so many occupations, without seeing any other man than her husband, and asked how she could settle any business but that of the Harem itself? and how she could succeed even in that without seeing the men servants? He replied, that "in the households of Persia there is always an officer called a Nazir, with whom the wife daily arranges all that relates to the male part of the establishment, to whom she pays the wages of the others; and who is accountable to her." As a necessary preparation for the duties which thus devolve upon them, the women of Persia learn to read and write: as children they are sent to school with the boys, and when too old to be permitted to go unveiled, their education is finished at home by female Mollahs, who attend them for the purpose. They do not, however, like European women, learn music and dancing: these arts are taught to slaves only, who practise them for the amusement of their owners: and the wives never sing or dance, except perhaps at the wedding of a brother or sister.

The King has this right over all the women of his realm, that they must appear unveiled before him.

GAME

GAME IN NORTH AMERICA.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

HAVING lately returned from Halifax, in Nova Scotia, I have taken the liberty of sending you a short account of the game in North America, which, if it is worthy of a place in your highly-amusing work, the Sporting Magazine, will be highly gratifying to your humble servant, X. Y. Z.

Windsor, March 5.

THE partridges are of a much larger size than they ever attain in England. They do not, like our birds, live in fields and corn lands, but frequent the woods, where they subsist on the berries of the beech trees, and fruit of the cranberry. The Indians kill them in considerable numbers, either with fire-arms procured from the English, or with their own bows and arrows, which are made with round nobs at the end, so that instead of making a wound, they bruise the object which they hit. Their flavour is not at all like that of the English partridge, but very much resembles that of the pheasant.

On the heath, at the back of the town of Halifax, there are a good many grouse to be met with, though their number is considerably thinned by the number of sportsmen, who are continually shooting them; however, farther inland there are still a considerable number. Snipes are found in immense quantities about Quebec, and it is no uncommon day's sport to kill from fifteen to twenty couple of them. They fly slower than those in this country, but are very fat, and much better flavoured.

There are no pheasants to be found in the whole of North America. Hares and rabbits are found in great numbers, but have no difference, either in appearance or taste, from those in England.—Wild fowls are in great abundance all about the lakes in South America, and arrive to their greatest perfection. There are a great many killed annually on the Halifax river, which always find a sure market; for game all over Nova Scotia is sold as regularly as meat in this country.

CRUELTY TO A HORSE.

Action tried in the Court of King's Bench, February 29.

Willan v. Hope.

THIS was an action to recover a compensation in damages for a horse, belonging to the plaintiff, which it was alledged had been killed by the defendant by excessive driving.

Mr. Garrow stated, that the plaintiff, Mr. Willan, was a gentleman well known as proprietor of several public carriages, and among them of the Leeds Mail, of which the defendant was employed as driver. On the 2d of September last, the Leeds Mail left town at the usual hour, drawn by four very fine horses, driven by the defendant; he proceeded to Highgate-hill at a rate much too fast, but there he stopped at the usual house; and, on starting again, he proceeded over Finchley Common, driving at a most furious rate, and continued so to drive till he got to Whetstone-gate, where, in order to pass another coach, and to give his poor exhausted horses a fresh impetus, he began to whip and flog them at a most furious rate; when the the horse in question, uttering a scream, dropped down and died instantly. And on opening him next morning, it was discovered that the arteries of the heart were ruptured from excessive exertion.

Mr. B. Sharp deposed, that he was an inside passenger in the Leeds Mail on the 2d of September last. When on Finchley Common, he observed the defendant endeavouring to take the lead of the Manchester Mail, at a very quick rate, and continued to do so till they arrived at Whetstone turnpike; but soon after they passed the gate, the coach stopped suddenly, and on Mr. Sharp getting out, he perceived the horse in question, which was one of the leaders, lying dead under the coach.

Mr. Ingham, a passenger on the outside of the Manchester Mail, deposed to the fact of the defendant passing through Whetstone-gate at a most furious rate; he did not think he had ever seen a carriage go so fast; when a few yards through the gate, he saw the horse stagger and fall.

Mr. Willan's farrier, at Barnet, proved that the other three horses, when they arrived at Whetstone-gate, were very much distressed, and in a most deplorable state. He opened the dead horse next morning, and his opinion was, the horse died in consequence of excessive hard driving.

Several other witnesses bore testimony to the same effect. The horse was proved to be worth from 35l. to 40l.

Mr. Park said, the defendant did not go faster than the other coaches, and had a light load; nor had he driven at any faster rate than was necessary to keep within the time allowed him, to perform the stage from town to Barnet in, namely, one hour and forty minutes. In support of this statement, he called the guard of the Leeds coach, and driver of the Manchester. Both these witnesses, however, acknowledged they had driven rather faster than usual: but denied that the surviving horses were distressed.

The Jury found a verdict for the plaintiff—Damages, 30l.—Costs, 40s.

ANALYSIS OF

MR. MORLAND'S GENEALOGY OF THE RACE-HORSE,

Lately published, with copious Extracts.

WHILST copious authorities are extant, it is a task of very little labour or difficulty to compile a book, even from the duodecimo to the folio size; nor, in this learned age, when we all write, is the atchievement very extraordinary, soon to acquire the faculty or habit of writing with sufficient correctness, fluency, and elegance, for the purpose of book-making. Nothing can be more civil and indulgent than the public on this head, perhaps for the very best reason. But this by the bye; for however alarmed the present writer, at this moment presumed a reader, may be, by this exordium, let him receive instant comfort at our declaration, that the full weight of our prefatory observations, by no means, in our opinion, attaches to him.—For, there are two sorts of compilers, videlicet, such as compile upon a subject of which they are totally and literally uninformed; others, who have a respectable and practical acquaintance with their subject, and who may have solid and useful reasons for compiling. Furthermore, more, there be two sorts of writers, of very unequal degrees of merit, among the class above-mentioned, who have come cheaply and easily by the faculty of writing—namely, they who, with fine words laboriously culled, though ill understood, bombastic phrases, and periods turned with the beautiful rotundity of a dumplin, attempt to ravish or seize, vi et armis, the palm of eloquence or elegance, without any qualms of conscience on the score of their legitimate right thereto. Others there be surely, meritorious men, who, confining themselves within the secure limits of their real acquirements, aim at nothing beyond conveying the information they may have to impart, in modest, intelligent language, at the same time sufficiently refined to avoid all occasions of disparagement or contempt.

Mr. Morland had an undoubted right to make a book on the subject of the Race-horse, and to challenge a certain degree of attention from the public, because he really possesses a practical knowledge of the turf. If he has not published any novelties, we are not aware that he has attempted to propagate any errors. His book is of a convenient size, the matter very well selected and arranged, and delivered in a very perspicuous, and by no means inelegant English. His title-page is most ample, according to the usual mode, with a Compendium, the intent being to shew how much instruction is afforded in a small compass. Thus he promises us—The History of the Race-horse and his Progenitors, from the earliest times—The General Practice of the most judicious Breeders—the present improved Method—the Selection of Stallions—Choice of Brood Mares and Colts for Racing, &c. &c.—the result of his observation and experience on the Turf for many years.

A very correct likeness of the author's stallion Eagle, forms the frontispiece, engraved from a painting of the celebrated James Ward, generally allowed by the cognoscenti to be the first of English animal painters now living. The worst thing in our author's book, and that, in truth, a most venial thing, and of no consequence, is his hobbyhorsical and whimsical nota bene under the horse's name—'the finest horse ever seen.' Now there is one reason why that note should have been absent—a reason, indeed, generally held of minor consequence—we mean, because it does not consist with fact. There have been many as fine, or finer horses than Eagle, besides being furnished with well-formed racing shoulders. Now, in all probability, the speed of Eagle was his best, because the uprightness and thickness of his shoulder were too great an obstruction to his powers of continuance.

We will now take our canter over the book, pulling up at every opportunity of throwing in a remark: that duty concluded, we will allow our readers a liberal portion of extracts, in order that they may form their own judgment, and, we hope, confirm ours.

Pa. 2. Mr. Morland derives the Arabian from the Persian horses, contrary to the generally received opinion, which, however, in a subsequent page (16), he repeats, making Arabia, as in all probability it really was, the mother, or original breeding country.

Pa. 25. 'In order to possess a breed of fine horses, the males and females of different countries must have reciprocal intercourse.' This passage passage may lead to a very important misunderstanding of the subject, since the uninformed may be led to suppose, that provided they are fine horses, those of any country would serve the purpose of making up the mixture, or amalgama, for the race-horse. In fact, nine out of ten of the good people of this country, many of them even sportsmen, take it for granted, that the courser, or race-horse, has been actually formed from a cross of the Arabian and Barb, upon the native breed of England; and many were surprised enough to be told, that the English race-horse did not, except fortuitously and by stealth, either originally or progressively, contain one drop of English blood.

The author denies (pa. 34) the power of propagation in the mule, but facts seem to oppose him. One instance has of late years occurred in Scotland, several at St. Domingo, and in other West-India islands. It must be confessed strange, that such a general rule of nature should have any exception at all, although we are not quite so surprised at it, as we should be at such an exception to a general rule, as a man bearing a child, or even suckling one as vice to his wife.

We strongly recommend pa. 39 to our redoubtable Brunonian veterinarians, who make themselves very merry about "the system of catching cold," and who, without scruple, "strip a horse immediately from training, and turn him into a cold stable, or naked into the fields, by day or night, winter or summer, however the wind or weather may be." Such treatment it seems, far from being improper, is held advantageous! Q. Is it generally found so, and do proprietors find it their interest to entrust their horses to such practitioners?

"Race horses to be allowed to gallop with either leg foremost"—this is by mistake repeated in two pages. The author's notions of breeding, care, feeding, &c. are extremely sound and liberal, and his humanity laudably conspicuous.

Mr. Morland accedes to the opinion of a necessity of crossing the blood through the different breeds of the race horse; for example, the Godolphin with the Darley Arabian blood, &c. Whether this be merely a matter of turf fashion, deeply rooted, and whether crossing of shapes be not of far greater importance, we shall not stop to discuss here; the subject, indeed, having been already handled somewhat extensively elsewhere.

Pa. 88. "Herod died in 1780:" Yes, and the author might have added the report, that poor King Herod, celebrated as he was, died of a mortification in his sheath, brought on by filth and nastiness, and being suffered to be stewed in his own dung. His no less celebrated son Highflyer, died equally, or rather far more miserable. Nature being exhausted, by excess of covering as was said, he laid three days in continued and excessive agonies, but the feeling generosity of putting an end to the poor animal's sufferings was not resorted to. Whilst a spark of life remained, there issued a spark of hope for more pelf! Oh! &c. &c. auri sacra fames.

On the racing seat on horseback, (pa. 116.) we differ in a certain particular from the author. Has it indeed become the fashion to turn the toes inwards? The present writer has occasionally ridden in public, but ever with toes turned out, and somewhat upward. In that form Chifney rode, and every other former jockey of note, within our remembrance. Exclusive of the idea that turning in the toes à-la-manége, must give an uneasy and less secure jockey seat, there does not exist the necessity for it which is found in the ranks, where toes turned out would interfere. Nor can there exist any necessity for turning the spurs outwards, since, when pointed inwards, there is not the smallest fear of their touching the horse's sides, but in consequence of considerable exertion to that end in the jockey.

It is a horrid idea, and a pity that such should ever be connected with sporting—" to spur under the fore bowels, at the last extremity." Nothing beyond fair exertions with life, not unto death, should be required.

Chifney's "fine manner" of riding the race-horse is introduced (pa. 121), and the horse at full speed, is to be held together, with a pressure upon the mouth, insufficient to rupture a hair. We formerly debated this matter with Samuel Chifney, and now repeat, that this theory was far too finely spun, and a good deal of imagination entered into the description of his practice. We readily grant, that it was the practice of the old school, to bear too heavily upon the horse's mouth in his course, but were the horse all abroad, left entirely without a pull, he would outstride himself, and actually lose ground. Besides, all horses in their career require to be steadied by a pull, which they invariably affect and find comfortable. We appeal to Mr. Buckle, who is, we believe, a reader of this Magazine.

The remarks on starving horses, during the winter, in a straw yard, do the author's humanity and common sense infinite credit: in fine, we have much pleasure in speaking handsomely and with commendation of his book.

DEFINITION OF A GRAND AND BEAUTIFUL HORSE.

THE superior part of the neck, from which the mane issues, should first rise in a straight line from the withers, and as it approaches the head, form a curve. The inferior part of the neck should have no curvature, but rise in a straight line from the breast to the under jaw, with a small inclination forward.

The superior part of the neck should be thin, with little flesh near the mane. A fine neck should be moderately long and elevated, proportioned to the size of the animal; the head thin, meagre, and not too long; small ears, erect, not stiff, narrow, and placed on the upper part of the head, at a proper distance from each other; front narrow, and a little convex: eye-pits well filled, eye-lids thin; eyes pretty large and prominent, brilliant, lively, and full of fire; the pupil rather large; forehead flat; nose somewhat arched; muzzle small; nostrils expanded and deep, divided by a thin partition; mouth moderately split, lips thin; withers sharp and elevated; the back equal, a little arched; ribs deep, belly capacious; the quarters long and finely turned; the tail set on high; thighs full and muscular; hock round before, broad on the sides, and tendinous behind; the shank thin before, broad on the sides; the tendo Achilles prominent, large, and well detached from the leg bone; the fetlock prominent, and ornamented with a small tuft of hair; the pasterns large, and of moderate length; hoof tough; quarters round; heels broad, and a little prominent; frog thin and small; sole thick and concave; bosom prominent; shoulders flat, supple, and not too heavy; blade bones declining, and well knit to the withers; fore legs well placed; arms or fore thighs muscular; knees lean; fore legs proportioned to those behind.

It is a common, and at the same time a judicious remark, that length is a great perfection in a race horse. This I am ready to admit, provided he has proportionate substance or powers withal; but when that is not the case, it is a symptom of weakness, yet it is always an indication of speed. A long reach is equally necessary, and is generally a concomitant perfection to that of length. A small head, large thropple, and wide nostrils, are esteemed marks of goodness; respiration being facilitated by the two latter, on which the continuance of bodily exertions greatly depend.

Fitness in a race horse is demonstrated by his vigour and energy, good wind, lightness, or, in more explicit terms, that state of bodily condition and appearance, in which the animal frame seems discharged of all superfluous flesh and fat, externally and internally, by means of physic, proper exercise, good dressing, and being fed upon sweet and dry food.

In such a state of condition, the muscles appear distinctly marked, and, from their tone and firmness, so well adapted to all the purposes of motion, as to perform their offices without exhausting the strength, or producing any visible symptoms of fatigue. The coat appears bright, the veins prominent, the spirits elate, the animal panting for conquest, and on the least indication given by his rider, eager to exert his utmost powers in competition with his rival candidates for fame.

The season for copulation between the horse and mare, by an established custom, is the space of time between the 1st of February and the 14th of July, about five months and a half. Now, as it frequently happens that some mares in a stud are barren, it is of material consequence that such mares should be stinted as early in the season as possible. The produce of these mares, in all probability, will be engaged in stakes, and start at two or three years old; and as blood horses take the dates of their ages on the 1st day of May annually, whether foaled previous or subsequent to that time, the colts which are brought forth in January or February, will possess numerous advantages over those produced three or four months later, in respect to size, strength, &c.

When a mare brings forth early in the Spring, she should not be allowed to go out of her box or shed into the open air, until the fourth or fifth day after her delivery; and even then she should be attended, to prevent the foal from laying down upon the cold ground, which would endanger its life, being very susceptible of cold at this tender age.

I lost one of the finest colts, I think, I ever bred, by Whiskey, dam by Highflyer, in consequence of suffering the dam to go into a paddock for two hours, even in the month of April. It caught a violent cold, which produced an inflammation of the bowels, that carried carried it off almost immediately. They should be inured to the cold air by degrees, until they are able to bear it without injury.

Mares which have brought forth colts, are generally inclined to copulate nine days after their delivery. It has been a practice of mine to indulge this periodical propensity on the ninth, tenth, and eleventh successive days, either early in the morning, or in the evening; from which mode of practice, conception has, in most instances, been effected without any unnecessary loss of time.

When you are thoroughly convinced the mare is stinted, obvious from the extreme aversion she shews towards the stallion, she may then be turned out to pasture in the company of her own sex. I have always considered it necessary to allow brood mares, if barren, a reasonable allowance of oats, which should be given twice in a day: those which give suck should be liberally fed, as the quantity and quality of the milk is greatly improved thereby; consequently, the growth of the foal is greatly promoted.

Sheds are equally necessary to protect them from the scorching rays of the sun in Summer, and spacious airy boxes to defend them from the inclemency of the weather in Winter; which should be kept clean and well littered. Thatch is a covering for sheds preferable to slates or tiles, being cooler in Summer, and warmer in Winter.

Sweet oats, fragrant upland hay, soft water, airy, spacious, and well littered boxes; cleanliness and regular attention, are so indispensibly necessary in breeding for the turf, that it would be ridiculous to expect a large, beautiful, and healthy race of colts, without the most scrupulous attention to all those particulars.

Foals may run with their dams until Michaelmas, when it will be proper to wean them: they should be put in pairs, or separately, into comfortable boxes, fed with sweet thin-skinned oats and fragrant hay, and not allowed to go abroad for ten or fourteen days, when the traces of natural affection for their dams will be obliterated from the memory. It will be advisable to feed them thrice every day, mixing a little bran now and then with their oats, or giving a mash to keep the body in a proper state. Foals intended for racing, having been accustomed to feed upon oats along with their dams during the Summer, if kept clean and warm, are well littered, and regularly fed, seldom experience any check in their growth, in consequence of being separated from their dams. At the expiration of ten or fourteen days, they may be suffered to exercise themselves for a few hours in the middle of the day, in a well-fenced paddock, when the weather permits.

Accidents frequently happening from the general mode of haltering foals, and lashing them to a tree, post, &c. immediately; it has been my practice to catch an opportunity of fixing the headstal upon the head in a box, tying a firm knot underneath the jaws, to prevent the halter from cutting them; I then fix a strong tape or cord, seven or eight yards in length, to the end of the halter, which I throw upon the ground, and entice the foal, with oats in a sieve, to follow me out of the box into a paddock. When arrived in the paddock, I take hold of the tape or cord, and advance with my back to its head a little forwards; at the same same time the foal is followed by a person with a whip in his hand, which he flourishes a little, by which means the foal is impelled to follow the person who precedes it, and by a few lessons is taught to lead quietly. The headstal is suffered always to remain upon the head, with the shank rolled neatly up. It is almost unnecessary to add, that kindness and gentle treatment are peculiarly necessary at this tender age.

The foals may be treated in the manner I have directed during the Winter, allowing them as much corn (oats) as they will eat without waste, until they can have the benefit of Spring grass, when the fillies may be turned out into paddocks in pairs; but the colts must be kept separate, for having now attained to a considerable size and strength, there is great danger to be apprehended from the violent manner in which they attack each other in play.

Continue to feed them with a liberal allowance of oats twice or thrice in the course of the day, and allow them a small quantity of very sweet hay daily.

About the latter end of April, or the beginning of May, the doors of the boxes or hovels may be left open, and they may be allowed to go out and in at pleasure; but in cold weather, they should be always shut up during the night.

Lucern generally precedes Spring grass, is gently aperient and cooling, and very much relished by young colts at this season. When you have sufficient supply of this plant, bran and mashes may be discontinued.

Carrots are esteemed very cooling and wholesome food, affording a great share of nourishment; and when washed clean, and sliced transversely, may be given to young colts once a day, or oftener, during the Winter, being a palatable and acceptable treat.

Tares are preferred by horses to any other description of green food, and, in my opinion, promote the growth of young stock more than any other herbage. They should be cut early in the morning, with the dew upon them, and given fresh, with a liberal allowance of corn.

Some breeders recommend bruised oats for foals when weaned, which, they say, will prevent inflammations of the eyes, occasioned by mastication; but as I never observed that any bad effects were produced from giving them whole, I have adhered to the common practice.

GAME LAWS.

On Saturday, the 29th ult. three informations were preferred before the Commissioners acting under the authority of the Assessed Tax Act for the division of St. Alban, by a servant of the Hon. and Rev. Wm. Capel, Vicar of Watford, against Hollingshead, Carter, and Wilson, three gamekeepers, appointed by the Earl of Essex, for the manors of Watford, Bushey, and Parksbury, charging them with incurring penalties of 20l. each, for using a gun for the purpose of killing game, without having obtained such certificate as is directed by the Act of the 48th of the King. The Rev. Mr. Capel was himself the only witness, to substantiate the charges, and he swore he saw Hollingshead on the 17th of September, shooting on the manor of Watford. On producing the certificate for 1811, it appeared to

to be granted to him for the manor of Cashio, although that granted in 1810 was for the manor of Watford, and it was contended to be a mere clerical mistake, in inserting the word Cashio for Watford. The Commissioners, however, thought themselves bound to convict.

The Rev. Mr. Capel then swore he saw Carter (who was the keeper for Bushey) in company with Hollingshead, on the estate of W. Smith, Esq. in the manor of Cashio, on the 28th of September; that he saw both shoot, and one bird fall. Mr. Smith was called on the part of Carter, who said he had asked the favour of Lord Essex to send his keepers to shoot him a brace of birds on his own land; and that they did so, and sent him the birds. The Commissioners thought themselves also bound to convict Carter.

In the third information, Mr. Capel would only swear, that while in conversation with the Earl of Clarendon, he saw Wilson with a gun in his hand, come out of a wood in Cashio manor, but that he had no dogs, nor was he beating for game. The Commissioners immediately dismissed this information, and without any hesitation or application on the part of the two first defendants, mitigated the penalties to 10l. each, regretting the law did not allow them to go still lower.

ZOOLOGY OF THE ISLAND OF ICELAND.

From Sir G. S. Mackenzie's Travels in that Country.

IN a general outline of the zoological productions of Iceland, it is by no means necessary to be minute; nor, indeed, would the few observations we were enabled to make, authorize such an undertaking.

Iceland does not present many of those species of animals which are strictly confined to the land; but of those which require land only as a resting place, while the sea supplies their other wants, many have found in this country every requisite for support. We will proceed, however, to take a cursory survey of all the tribes of animated nature which exist there under any circumstances.

The catalogue of mammiferous animals inhabiting Iceland, is nearly confined to the following:—The dog, the fox, the cat, the rat, the mouse, the rein-deer, the goat, the sheep, the ox, and the horse; together with seals and whales, and a few Polar bears, which annually make their appearance.—Bears cannot be considered as inhabitants; they are merely visitors, brought on detached masses of ice. They are chiefly landed on the north coast: and twelve or thirteen appears to be the greatest number ever seen in one year. They are not suffered long to enjoy themselves on land; for, hungry and voracious after their voyage, they commit great devastations among the flocks. The people take the alarm; and, with whatever weapons they can command, generally with musquets, they attack, and soon destroy them.

The dogs which are generally seen in Iceland, bear a strong resemblance to those of Greenland. Like them, they are covered with long hair, forming about their necks a kind of ruff. Their noses are sharp, their ears pointed, and their tails bushy, and curled over their backs. Their predominant colour is white; yet they vary consider-considerably; and some are entirely brown or black. Very few of them can be induced to go into the water; and though some are of service in guarding the cottages and flocks, and preventing the horses from eating the grass intended for hay, yet the greater number appear very useless. Scarcely any family, however, is without one or two of them.

Two distinct varieties of the fox present themselves in Iceland: the arctic, or white fox (Canis Lagopus), and one which is termed the blue fox (Canis Fuliginosus), and varies considerably in the shades of its fur, from a light brownish or blueish grey, to a colour nearly approaching to black. It is a more gracefully-formed animal than the white fox, has longer legs, and a more pointed nose. Horrebow mentions a dark red coloured fox, in the existence of which we had no reason to believe. He likewise says, that the black fox is sometimes brought over on the ice.—Frequently at night, in travelling through the country, you hear the discordant cries of the two former varieties. But if we may judge from the quantity of skins exported, the number of foxes in Iceland, though considerable, cannot be great. The inhabitants do their utmost to destroy them; being induced not only to prevent the great devastation which they commit among the young lambs, but to obtain the reward given by Government, and to profit by the furs, which is an advantageous article of traffic. There is no particular ingenuity, however, displayed in the methods by which they are taken; they are shot, caught in gins, or forced from their holes by smoke.

Rats in considerable numbers, and mice, are met with, particularly at the Danish factories; but, as far as our observation went, there was nothing to render them particularly worthy of attention.

The hog, which has from time to time been imported from Denmark, has, from the scarcity of proper food, been found so expensive to keep, that it has never been much propagated; and it is doubtful whether, independently of two or three sows and pigs which were taken from England during the last summer, a single animal of the species exists in the country.

The rein-deer has been introduced into the island, and has increased rapidly. Out of thirteen which were exported from Norway in 1770, three only reached Iceland. They were sent into the mountains of the Guldbringè Syssel; and they have since multiplied so considerably, that it is now no uncommon thing for those who pass often through the mountains in various parts of the island, to meet with herds, consisting of from forty to sixty, or a hundred. They are very little molested, the Icelanders satisfying themselves with complaining that the deer eat their lichen; and though, sometimes, for the sake of amusement, the Danes go out in pursuit of them, very few are destroyed. They live almost entirely among the mountains, and are very shy; but sometimes, in the depth of winter, come down into the plains, particularly about Thingvalla, to feed on the moss which abounds in that quarter.

Goats were at one time more numerous in Iceland than they now are. At present, they seem to have been completely expelled from the southern part, because vegetation being very scanty, they were constantly constantly injuring the roofs of the houses by climbing on them in search of food. There are still a few in the north, where farmers keep flocks of thirty or forty.

The cow, the horse, and the sheep, afford the principal source of wealth, comfort, and subsistence to the Icelanders. Milk is almost their only summer beverage. Whey becomes a wholesome, and to them a pleasant drink in winter. Even fish itself, their primary article of food, is scarcely palatable to an Icelander without butter; and curds, eaten fresh in summer, and kept through the winter, yield the most precious change of diet, both for health and pleasure, which he enjoys. A cow on the farm of the Amtmand Stephenson, we were assured, gave regularly every day twenty-one quarts of milk. Their value is well known and appreciated by the Icelanders, who take the greatest care of them through the winter, and seem to shake off their habitual listlessness, while employed in gathering in the hay that is to support them through the inclemencies of that season.

If the horse be less useful in Iceland than the cow, the care which is devoted to him is proportionally less: still, however, the assistance which he affords is by no means to be overlooked. But it will be unnecessary, after what has been stated respecting the frequent intercourse between different parts of the island, and the extreme roughness of the country, to say any thing farther of the utility of this animal. The Iceland horse is about thirteen hands in height, stoutly made, and frequently evincing much spirit. These animals are in very considerable numbers throughout all the inhabited parts of the island; no farmer being able to carry on the necessary affairs of life without their assistance; and many of the Icelanders, particularly those who, from their avocations as judges or magistrates, are obliged to take long journies, are at great pains in the breeding and rearing of them. But by the inhabitants in general, they are let loose to provide themselves with food and shelter; in consequence of which, a great number are annually carried off by the severity of the winter.

The sheep furnish much milk and butter; and besides affording, when smoked or salted, a part of the winter food of the inhabitants, form a considerable article of export. Almost every part of the Icelandic dress is manufactured from wool: and of the sheep-skins, without much preparation, they make their fishing-dresses, which they smear repeatedly with oil, for the purpose of rendering them impervious to the water.

Of the seal, three or four species (Phoca vitulina, Leporrina, Barbata, and Grœnlandica) frequent the shores. Their number is considerable. A few are taken for the oil which they afford; and their skins are applied to various useful purposes, being formed into shoes and thongs, and particularly into a kind of travelling bag, in which the Icelanders carry their sour butter, fish, and other little supplies, when passing from place to place.

Very few of the great northern whales (Balæna Mysticetus) approach Iceland. The fin-fish (Balæna Physalus) is more common. A species of dolphin, the bottle-nose, (Delphinus Bidens ?) is sometimes driven on shore in very considerable shoals. During the winter 1809-10, eleven hundred came towards the shore in the Hvalfiord, and were captured.

Of the Linnean order Accipitres, we only saw one, the Great Erne, or Cinereous Eagle (Falco Albicilla). According to Pennant, the following other species exist in Iceland:—the white-headed eagle (Falco Leucocephalus); the Iceland falcon (Falco Gryfalco); Falco fulvus; and the Lanner. Of all these, the Erne is, at present, certainly the most frequent, the others being very seldom seen. It is constantly observed hovering over the shores, and is a determined enemy to the Eider-duck; and, as such, of course draws upon itself the hatred of the Icelanders. The Iceland falcon, once so much valued in Denmark for its excellence in falconry, is now suffered to remain unmolested; yet it does not seem to multiply as might be expected; and during our residence in the island, we had not a single opportunity of seeing it, even at a distance.

The raven is very common in Iceland. A pair or more sit near every habitation on the sea-shore, ready to feed on the offal of the fish; and they frequently do great mischief to the fish itself, when split and left on the beach to dry. They build their nests in the cliffs, and sometimes resort for this purpose to rocks a considerable way inland.

The snow-flake, or snow-bunting, (Emberiza nivalis), resides here during the whole year, occurring in pairs, or solitary, during the summer, when it loses much of its snowy plumage; and collecting into flocks in the winter. This is the only bird in Iceland which can truly be said to attempt singing. The song is pleasing, but short, and much resembles the first two or three notes of the robin-redbreast.

The wheat-ear (Motacilla Oenanthe) was not uncommon; and we sometimes saw another small bird, of a brownish colour, in the marshy places, which we had no opportunity of examining.

The white wagtail (Motacilla Alba) frequents the margins of the pools and rivulets. Very few of the swallow tribe ever arrive in Iceland. Some of our party saw one or two flying about the church at Reikiavik early in the month of July; but to what species they belonged, was not ascertained.

Ptarmigans (Tetrao Lagopus) are generally very abundant in this country; but when we were there, we were told that they were scarce in the neighbourhood of the town, and in some other parts of the country. Towards the latter end of July, we observed a bird of the grouse kind, with a brood of young ones: it was possibly the species which Paulson, in his catalogue of Iceland birds, has called the hazel grouse. It had less white, and in general differed somewhat in its plumage from the common ptarmigan, and appeared to be larger.

Of all the land-birds which are seen in Iceland, none are more common than the golden plover and the curlew. These birds are frequently the only enliveners of dreary plains and extended marshes, where their wild and inharmonious notes accord well with the surrounding scenery. The snipe is likewise common in the same situations; and in some instances seemed to have lost much of that wildness of disposition which it exhibits in this country. Thus we saw it associating, as it were, with the Eider-ducks, and sitting on its eggs eggs within an hundred yards of the house at Vidöe.

The variety of birds which frequent the sea-shore is very great. The high rocky islets on the south are covered with gannets (Pelicanus Bassanus). The shag (Pelicanus Graculus) and the corvorant (Pelicanus Carbo) sit constantly on the rocks. Innumerable gulls, fulmars, and shearwaters, breed in the cliffs. The black gull (Larus Crepidatus) we saw frequently in the swamps, in considerable numbers. Ducks, mergansers, and divers, in great variety, are at one time seen floating on the bays, and at another, suffer themselves to be carried along by the rapid streams, or accompany their young broods in the marshes. Large flocks of auks and guillemots live about the coasts, which, together with the kittiwake, and other species of the gull, present in their eggs and feathers a valuable reward to the Icelanders for the fatigue and labour they undergo in their pursuit.

The tern (Sterna Hirundo) is another bird which is very common, always choosing, for the purpose of breeding, a piece of fresh water situated in a marsh near the sea-shore. The egg of this bird is a very delicate article of food, and frequently formed a principal relish in our homely repasts. We saw the tern, for the first time, on the 27th of May, at Grundivik; and, as we had not seen it at Reikiavik when we were there only a few days before, this was probably about the time of its arrival in Iceland. Mr. Macwick, in the Linnean Transactions, gives as an average of twenty-six years observations, that the Sterna Hirundo is first seen in England April 1st, and last seen October the 8th. He likewise represents the snipe as appearing November 20th, and disappearing March 20th.

The most majestic bird of Iceland is undoubtedly the Swan. It in general seeks the more remote lakes among the mountains, resorting at times to the salt marshes about the sea-shore, where forty or fifty are sometimes seen feeding together. During the breeding season, they retire in pairs to small lakes, where they may be concealed among the reeds, and thus protect themselves from the attacks of the Icelanders, who receive the value of a few shillings for their skins from the Danish merchants. Of the eggs, we once had an opportunity of partaking; and though somewhat heavy, they were very palatable.

So much has already been said respecting the manners and habits of that most curious and interesting bird, the Eider-duck, that it will be unnecessary to do more than merely mention its name in this place.

Some parts of the coast of Iceland, particularly the bays on the west, abound with varieties of very fine cod; for which, before the discovery of Newfoundland, a considerable fishery was carried on; so that, in the reign of James I., no less than one hundred and fifty British vessels were employed in Iceland fisheries. Great numbers are still taken by the Icelanders, chiefly for the Danish merchants, who dry them, either with or without salt, and export them to Denmark. Some are consumed by the Icelanders themselves; but their number is comparatively small, as they either prefer haddocks, or are obliged to eat them because the merchants will scarcely take any thing but cod. The best season for fishing is from the beginning of February to the middle of May. In June, the fish become meagre and watery, as this is the month in which they generally cast their spawn.

The haddock is likewise very plentiful, apparently associating with the cod, for they are always taken together. They grow to a size not inferior to the cod, frequently measuring above three feet in length; and are to the inhabitants of greater importance than any thing with which nature or art has supplied them.

The ling, the skate, and the hollibut, occur in considerable numbers, though not nearly so common as the two last. The hollibut arrives at a great size; and, like the wolf-fish, is cut up and dried for winter use. Flounders abound on the shores; and herrings are taken in great numbers on the north coast. They come in extensive shoals in the months of June and July, not less than one hundred and fifty barrels of them having been taken at one draught of a net. Sharks are taken in great abundance on the north and western coasts.*

Eels are found in the rivers; and we once observed a very fine one in a stream, which was rendered tepid by the admixture of the water arising from a hot spring. Two or three species of the salmon frequent the rivers and lakes, among which the sea-trout is in great perfection.

The Zeus Opah has been seen in Iceland. One, of which we saw a tolerable drawing, was taken about two years ago.

Of the insect tribes, we saw nothing very remarkable. A large Tipula (Plumosa?) began to appear in considerable numbers about the middle of May: and although, as the summer advanced, a few of the most common species of flies and moths were seen,—once only, in a low and marshy situation, in the month of July, did we experience any inconvenience from them. At that time, the air was thickly peopled by a small yellow-coloured fly, probably a species of Empis.

"The entomological productions of Iceland," says Mr. Hooker," are extremely scanty. A very small collection of insects indeed, rewarded my researches in this department of natural history; and of these there were none that were in the least remarkable for their beauty. Some of the Lepidopterous species were new to me; among which I think I had five or six nondescript Phalenæ. No Papilio or Sphinx has ever been met with in the country. Of Coleopterous insects there is scarcely a greater variety; and I saw only a single Scarabæus, and a very few Curculiones and Carabi, most of which, however, to make me amends, were such as I was unacquainted with. I, by mere accident, have still preserved a specimen of an undescribed species of Coccinella, which I found killed by

* It has been mentioned in the journal, that it is probably the species known by the name of the basking-shark; but the colour is different from that of the Squalus Maximus, being of a pinkish tinge. From figures I have seen of the white shark, from the general shape of those we saw, and from other circumstances, it appears to be that variety which is so common on the coasts of Iceland, and not the basking-shark.

by the steam of one of the hot springs of the Geysers; it was the only one of the genus that I saw."

Small crabs, of two or three species, are thrown upon the shore, together with the star-fish and echinus; of which latter we once observed a great number carried by the birds, and dispersed along an extensive marsh to a considerable distance from the sea.

Muscles are in great abundance, and also whelks, snails, and limpets; and the barnade often forms a firm coating to the rocks.

FIRST FOALS.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

HAVING, in the course of my acquaintance with the turf, often heard the opinion entertained that a mare's first foal is generally inferior in speed and goodness to her subsequent produce, I have, by way of shewing how erroneous that opinion is, transmitted you a list of eminent horses, all of which were the first foals of their respective dams.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, B.

THE LANDLORD AND HIS GUEST.

AT the late Northampton Assizes, a cause came on for trial, before Mr. Justice Bayley, wherein Mr. Edward Leeds, a respectable and opulent grazier of Eyebury, was plaintiff, and Mr. Wm. Daniels, landlord of the Angel Inn, at Peterborough, defendant. The cause of the action arose from the defendant having refused to admit the plaintiff's horse at the aforesaid inn; and the damages were laid at 100l.

From the address of Mr. Torkington ton to the Jury, on behalf of the plaintiff, and the evidence of his witnesses, Mr. Sampson Barber, a gentleman residing near Peterborough, Mr. Charles Warner, of Eye, and Daniel Hooton, the hostler, at the Angel Inn, it appeared that Mr. Leeds had long frequented the ordinary at the Angel Inn, which is resorted to by most of the principal farmers and graziers who attend Peterborough market. That on the 19th of April last, he went to the Angel, and having hung his horse at a hook in the yard, desired the hostler to put his horse into the stable, to which Hooten replied, that " he durst not do it against his master's orders." The plaintiff then said that " he would be hostler himself," and immediately put his horse into the stable. Mr. Daniels soon after went into the stable, and finding the plaintiff's horse there, led it out and hung it on the hook in the yard, where it remained in the yard for five or ten minutes. On the 4th of May, Mr. Leeds was again refused admittance for his horse into the stable. However, on the cross-examination of Hooton by Mr. Torkington, the reason came out why the defendant pursued the line of conduct complained of. On the 17th of April, Mr. Leeds, after having attended a christening at Peterborough, returned to the Angel in a state of intoxication, and conducted himself very improperly, abusing the waiter and his master and mistress, and refusing to discharge a debt that he had incurred; which induced Mr. Daniels to come to the determination of not admitting him again to his house.

Mr. Reader, in a brief address to the Jury for the defendant, observed, that although he felt confident of obtaining a verdict at their hands, yet, in proof of the honourable conduct of Mr. Daniels, he would adhere to a proposal which he before made, of withdrawing a juror.—This was immediately assented to by the plaintiff.

Judge Bayley told the Jury, that the course which the parties had wisely adopted, had left nothing for himself and the Jury to do; yet he thought it right to inform them, that although an inn-keeper is bound to receive a traveller as his guest, upon being tendered a reasonable price for his accommodation, yet it is at the option of the landlord to shew his guest into what room he pleased, and therefore that the plaintiff had no right to insist upon going into the ordinary or any other particular room, without being shewn into that room, or having the landlord's permission to go there.

ECLIPSE—AND MANCHESTER COCKING.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

IN your Magazine for October last, I find the following Quere respecting Eclipse:—" Whether he or any other horse ever went a mile in a minute?" It is answered by a Correspondent in your next Number for November, " That no such performance stands upon record, either of Eclipse, Childers, or any other horse;" and the writer mentions such circumstances as seem partly to carry conviction with them, by stating the performances of Childers, but does not mention those of Eclipse.—In the eleventh volume of your Magazine, page 71, it is asserted that " Eclipse once once ran a mile in a minute, for a run of two miles;" but from this vague statement, it does not appear whether it was the first or second mile, or both, nor does the assertion seem to rest upon any authority, as neither time, place, nor any according circumstance, is mentioned. It would be very acceptable to the generality of your readers, if your Correspondent who has with so much ability answered the above Quere, would favour us with an account of the performances of Childers and Eclipse, with a parallel of the merits of those two celebrated horses. With respect to Childers being the fleetest horse upon record, it seems in some instances to admit of a dispute, if the following accounts are to be relied upon, viz. "In 1721, Childers ran over the Beacon Course, carrying 8st. 7lb. in seven minutes and thirty seconds.——In 1755, Match'em and Trojan (same weight), ran over the Beacon Course, in seven minutes and twenty seconds.—And in 1799, Hambletonian, 8st. 3lb. and Diamond, 8st. ran over the Beacon Course in seven minutes and fifteen seconds," (vide Sporting Magazine, vol. 19, page 154). At the same time, I am not aware of any performance upon record, equal to Childers's running the Round Course at Newmarket with 9st. 2lb. in six minutes and forty seconds.

As you are in the habit of giving your readers portraits of some of the most celebrated racers, it would be conferring an additional obligation, if you would enrich some future Number or Numbers, with portraits of Childers and Eclipse.

I send you the following statement of the Manchester Midlent Main.—I am, Sir, your's, E. B.

Manchester, March 19, 1812.

COCKING.

The grand Midlent Main of Cocks was fought at Manchester, on Monday, the 9th of March, and the three following days, between Cheshire and Lancashire, for five guineas a battle, and three hundred guineas the main, to shew fifty-five cocks for the main, and twenty for the byes, out of which forty-nine came in for the main, and nineteen for the byes.—Feeders, Gilliver for Cheshire, Gosling for Lancashire; which was won by the former, thirteen a head.—The following is a statement of each day's fight:

NEGLIGENT DRIVING.

Action tried in the Court of King's Bench.

Seegrove v. Wilson.

THIS was an action brought by a gentleman residing in Charles-square, Hoxton, against a merchant chant in Frederick's-place, for damage done to the plaintiff's gig, by the negligence of the defendant's coachman in driving against it.—The accident happened in the road between Ball's-pond and Kingsland, but the evidence on both sides was most contradictory; the plaintiff's son and his servant, who were thrown out of the gig by the concussion, testifying that they could not go nearer to their proper side of the road, and the defendant's coachman swearing that he could not have gone above a foot nearer to his, although the road was eighteen feet wide, and there were no other carriages in the way; two witnesses estimating the rate at which the plaintiff's son was driving at nine or ten miles an hour, and three at five and a half; and the evidence on the plaintiff's part proving, that the defendant's coachman drove his hind wheel into the plaintiff's gig; whereas that on the part of the defendant went to say, that the track of his wheels shewed at the time that he had deviated from and not towards the plaintiff's carriage, and that the plaintiff's son drove against the coach, to his own destruction, mistaking the left-hand rein for the right. It appeared, however, that both the defendant's coachman and his female servant, who was in the carriage, at first refused to give the plaintiff's son their master's address, and the former required him to deliver his address first, for which there could be no pretence, as the coach sustained no damage whatever; and the Jury gave the plaintiff a verdict for the amount of the repairs, 7l. 8s. 6d.

Lord Ellenborough decided that the son of the plaintiff needed not to be released by his father, before he could give evidence. No action could be maintainable by the father against the son: the loan of the gig was gratuitous, and the son had no duty to perform, as a servant might have. Assumpsit would not lie that the son had undertaken carefully to drive, &c.

Another objection was also made on the part of the defendant, that his coachman was the servant of a jobman, and that the action should therefore have been against him, and not against Mr. Wilson. But it appeared, that the man boarded at the defendant's table, and Lord Ellenborough therefore held that he was in part paid by the defendant, and he acted under his direction entirely.

TRIAL OF

DANIEL DAWSON,

AT THE

CAMBRIDGE ASSIZES,

For Poisoning the Eagle Colt, the Property of Sir Frank Standish, at Newmarket, in May, 1811.

[In giving the following account of this extraordinary trial, we deem it necessary to inform our Readers, that it is principally compiled from a report taken in short hand by Mr. Kent, and published by Mr. R. Rogers, bookseller of Newmarket.—To such of our sporting friends as may wish a more circumstantial detail of this Trial, than can be given within the limits of a periodical Miscellany, we warmly recommend the purchase and perusal of Mr. Kent's Pamphlet.]

DANIEL Dawson, of Burwell, in the county of Cambridge, was indicted for feloniously, wilfully, and maliciously infusing into a certain trough where horses watered, six ounces of white arsenic, and thereby killing a colt, the property of Sir Frank Standish; in a second count he was indicted for procuring the said arsenic; in a third, a third, with causing the horse to drink the poisoned water; and in a fourth, generally with killing the said colt.—The prisoner on being interrogated, whether he was guilty or not guilty, replied "Not guilty—certainly not, by God!"

Mr. Serjeant Sellon for the prosecution, then detailed the case to the Jury, dwelling much on the enormity of the offence with which the prisoner stood charged.—He said this was not an offence recognised at Common Law, but was founded on the statute of the 9th Geo. I. c. 22. which was enacted for the purpose of punishing persons maliciously wounding, maiming, and killing of cattle.

The learned Counsel was well aware that the mere killing would not support this indictment, without an object attached to it. The statute upon which this indictment was founded, did not specify further than unlawfully and maliciously killing animals, but the motives by which the killing and maiming were to be considered. If it be proved that the horse, the subject of this indictment, was killed by poison, then it would be necessary also to prove pre-existing malice, and, said the learned Serjeant, "let us see what the law terms malice in this case." If a man kill or maim an animal in the moment of anger, the offence would not be recognized by this statute, as revenge or malice to the animal alone would not be sufficient without an object. The malice must be against the owner, and it was not sufficient to apply direct malice against the owner even, but, as in this case, the law implied malice where the animal was killed for an object of gain or reward, though the offender never had seen the owner. After the learned Counsel had dwelt on those points at some length, he proceeded to detail the facts of the case, which afterwards were laid before the Jury in evidence.

The first witness called was Mr. Richard Prince; he stated, that it was his general rule to water his horses after a gallop at troughs upon the heath, which he kept covered and padlocked; the lids of these troughs were made to fit as close as possible, but sometimes got warped by the sun, so that a small stick might be introduced into some part; that on the Saturday previous to the Craven Meeting, 1811, he left off watering at the usual troughs for his own private reasons, seventeen days; that on the 1st of May, conceiving that caution no longer necessary, he watered six horses at his usual troughs; viz. Sir Frank Standish's colt, The Dandy, Pirouette, Spaniard, and two of Sir S. Sitwell's; they were then all in good health; but on returning to their stable, they all refused their corn; and four of them, Sir F. Standish's colt, Pirouette, Spaniard, and The Dandy, died in consequence.

Mr. Henry Peter Fuller, chemist of Piccadilly, said, he analysed a quart of the water which had been taken from the troughs, and discovered that it contained a solution of arsenic; the water was so strongly impregnated, that a much smaller quantity than the general draught of a horse would kill that animal.

Mr. Bowles, Veterinary Surgeon at Cambridge, who had opened the horses, deposed, that he had no doubt their deaths were the effect of poison.

William Longford, who had been sent for from Portugal on this occasion, was the first witness called called to prove the guilt of the prisoner. He stated, that he was a servant to Mr. Howorth in October, 1810, when the prisoner frequently urged him to become an agent in the business; he had also solicited him to watch the troughs, and had endeavoured to impress his mind that his fortune would be easily made if he would embrace the opportunity. He was cross-examined by Mr. King, the prisoner's Counsel, but nothing came out to invalidate his evidence, or to prove that he knew any thing of the present transaction.

Cecil Bishop, who had been apprehended with Dawson, but now admitted evidence for the Crown, was then called, and the Court was so excessively crowded, that the clamour and pressure to see this distinguished personage, occasioned much confusion and disorder.—He stated, that he was brought up a chymist and druggist, and he first had a knowledge of the prisoner in 1807, when he, at that time, was a shopman in Wardour-street. That acquaintance had increased, and the prisoner knew witness's situation before he was in Wardour-street. The first transaction betwixt them was in Wardour-street, when the prisoner said he had a friend whose horse was about to run a match, but the animal had a swelled head, and it was supposed some trick had been played. He was desirous to know what had produced such effects; to which witness observed, it was perhaps a glandular affection. The prisoner was desirous of having something which would produce similar effects. Witness prepared him a solution of corrosive sublimate, which he said would be tried by a friend of his on some dog horses. He called on witness again in a month or six weeks after, and said the stuff had produced some effects, but was not strong enough to produce great effects, and witness made him up a stronger solution of the same kind. This happened in 1808, and the acquaintance between them was progressive. In 1809, witness left his situation in Wardour-street, and went to Guy's Hospital as an assistant apothecary. Dawson visited witness there, and on one occasion they went together to a public-house in Jewin-street, where they had wine, and the prisoner was describing the effects the solution of arsenic had produced, and asked him if it would not be better to give horses a dose sufficient to prevent their winning without doing any other injury. The prisoner agreed with witness, who procured him a bottle of solution of arsenic. They often met at this time, and witness gave the prisoner another bottle of poisonous liquid at a public-house in Bow-street, Bloomsbury. In a conversation about this time, the prisoner said he had done a fine thing, he had poisoned a brood mare and a hack, by putting poison a second time in a trough at Doncaster, and he at first heard there were five or six poisoned. Witness left Guy's Hospital in September, 1809. In the Spring of 1810, he accompanied the prisoner to Brighton, and during their journey, Dawson informed him that he had physic'd Reubens, the property of Lord Darlington, previous to the race for the Pavilion Stakes in 1808, Vandyke and others being in the race, but the preparation was not strong enough, and Reubens recovered, and won the race. The indisposition was attributed by the grooms and others, very knowing ones, to a fright the horse had met with with whilst exercising in a thunder storm. In October, 1810, witness engaged with Dawson to go to Newmarket and physic the troughs, out of which Poulton (who was about to run a match with Tumbler) drank. Witness went to Newmarket, but could not find the right trough and returned, and met the prisoner at Golden Cross, Charing Cross, who was setting off towards Newmarket. Witness informed prisoner he could not find the right trough, at which the prisoner expressed anger, and called him a d—d stupid ass. Witness informed the prisoner he had not done any thing with the letter directed to one Trist, who was well known upon the turf as a needy swell (if the elegant expression of the witness may be allowed.) This letter was to office Trist about laying bets on thick; the reason witness did not deliver it was, that he had been unsuccessful in his expedition to Newmarket, and consequently it would have been injurious. Other consultations were had in London after Dawson's return from Newmarket; Pirouette, belonging to Lord Foley, was then pitched on by Dawson as an object worthy the consideration of the *touting firm. The prisoner said it would be a rare thing to get at that mare which was first favourite for the Claret Stakes, and, as there were other prime cattle against her, it would be a sporting race. Witness and the prisoner set off from London to Newmarket together on this diabolical expedition on the 30th of March, and slept at Bourne Bridge. Witness stated that when the prisoner spoke of a good thing, it was that Trist could get on plenty of money. The prisoner did not accompany witness to Newmarket, as he observed his name was up there, and he should be suspected. Witness took up his abode at the Fox and Goose, in Newmarket, and being a stranger there, he made it his business to be at the Wheat Sheaf public-house in the morning, to tout Mr. Prince, who had the mare under his training, it being very near Mr. P.'s house, and very convenient for witness's purpose. The prisoner remained at the Four-mile Stables, where witness was to meet him on the Tuesday following, after he had infused the poison into the trough, having parted with Dawson on the Sunday evening. Witness succeeded in touting Mr. Prince, by finding out where he watered his horses, and he infused the poison into three of them. Witness, in communicating with the prisoner, asked if he knew there were as many as eleven horses under Mr. Prince's care? to which he replied, "he did not care if there were eleventeen hundred, it was a play or pay race," (that is, one on which bets are paid whether a horse run or not). The prisoner had furnished witness with a syringe, and a soft quill at the end, for the purpose of introducing it under some part of the lid of the trough, the latter having a crooked necked one before in his possession. The prisoner also gave him the solution, and was very anxious about all being right, as Trist would do the trick (meaning betting against the favourite mare). Witness was directed by Dawson not to physic the trough until Saturday, and in the intermediate time Bishop was touting Prince about the Course, affecting illness. The prisoner returned to London, and directed witness, after he had done the business,

* Touting—to look about—to see the coast is clear.—SLANG DICT.

to address him "Miss Bishop, 72, Upper Berkeley-street," to prevent suspicion; that was the house of Mr. Hall, a plumber, where the prisoner lodged. Witness infused the poison into the trough on the Friday instead of Saturday, by forcing the crooked syringe under the lid of both troughs at the Ditch. On Saturday morning, witness saw the horses drink, and immediately wrote a whimsical letter to the prisoner in London, stating that the poor children had knapped, which means that the horses had drank. Witness sent the letter in a parcel by the mail, and the next day received a satisfactory letter from Dawson, with a 1l. note enclosed therein. Witness physic'd the troughs again on the Monday or Tuesday morning following, and on communicating this to Dawson, he received another letter, which contained a pound note. On the subsequent Friday, witness again infused poison into the same troughs, and on writing to London to inform the prisoner of his success, that the cattle regularly drank, he received another remittance of a 2l. note. Considering he had done enough, witness left Newmarket on Saturday, and on Sunday saw the prisoner, and expressed his hope that all was right. The prisoner said the telegraph was strongly at work, which meant that betting was going on, and that the swell (Trist) was all right, which implied, that he was betting high and would act honourable. The prisoner went to the races at Newmarket and seemed down in the mouth (sulky); prisoner asked him what he had been at, adding that Spaniard, (one of Lord Foley's horses which Mr. Prince had under his care) run like an Eclipse, and he wondered what witness had been about, for there was nothing the matter with any of the horses as he could discover. The prisoner, in further conversation, said, Trist had been lucky enough to get off some of his money (that is, he had also betted on other horses), which was a fortunate circumstance.—Witness agreed to try it on again, although he considered himself in danger. Prisoner urged him to do the trick well, kill or no kill, or words to that effect, as Pirouette must not have a chance of a win. At this time the nefarious firm was straitened for money, and after consulting their wits, Dawson suggested, that he would introduce witness to a mail coachman who drove to Newmarket, named Prosser, as a person who was going into Norfolk to take possession of some property which had come to him by the death of a relation. Witness was what is termed shouldered down, that is, he walked on and was picked off the stones, and became the passenger of the coachman instead of the coach proprietor. Witness rode inside, and all he said to the coachman was, Newmarket; but when he got to that place he slanged the dragsman, (to use Bishop's elegant diction), which means that he sneaked away from the coach, without even apologising for his want of the means of paying, even at the shouldering system. Dawson, however, had pledged his honour that he would be answerable his friend, the witness, would do what was right at some time. This journey to Newmarket was on the Wednesday or Thursday before the Claret Stakes were run for. Witness again found out the troughs at the Ditch, but it was day-light in the morning when he got there; he therefore deferred infusing the poison son until the evening, being careful not to give away a chance of being suspected. He then physic'd the two troughs above mentioned, and also one at the Water Course.—Witness sauntered about the Course when Mr. Prince was exercising on the Flat, and as he did not see the horses water that morning, he was alarmed, as he supposed he was down (had knowledge of it). Witness, however, knew he had effectually done the trick, and that the children would knap; he wrote to Miss Bishop (Dawson), and expressed his anxiety that bets might be laid on pretty thick, (plentifully), for he had reduced his business to a certainty. Witness saw the prisoner on the Saturday, and the latter accompanied Trist to the Newmarket Meeting, when the Claret Stakes were to be run for. The next time witness saw the prisoner, the latter informed him that three or four of the horses were dead. A sort of wrangle now arose. Witness had been the horrid workman. The prisoner informed him part of Trist's speculation in betting had failed, from his having been called to cover (to stake the sum he betted), and which had ended in a match at horse-whipping, so that 8 or 900l. was off. This was the story of the prisoner to witness, who, in a state of alarm, exclaimed "I hope to God there is nothing wrong," (alluding to discovery). The prisoner gave witness the poisonous liquid.—Bishop then underwent a cross-examination by Mr. King, but nothing of importance was developed thereby.

William Prosser, who drove the Newmarket Mail in 1811, was then called, and his evidence corroborated that part of Bishop's testimony, which related to his leaving London without any money in his pocket, by witness's coach, and he proved the intimacy which then subsisted between Bishop and Dawson.

After another witness, named Timothy O'Marr, had been sworn, Mr. King took an objection to the indictment, which charged the prisoner with being a principal in the alledged act of poisoning, when in point of fact he was an accessary before the fact. There was another question arose out of the case, whether any offence had been committed by the prisoner. The Judge decided, without hearing the arguments of counsel, that the prisoner must be acquitted, on the grounds that the law did not recognise him as a principal.—With respect to the second objection, that no offence against the law had been committed by the prisoner, it was unnecessary to argue, the Judge having decided on the first and more prominent objection.

It was suggested to the Judge that bail was ready for the prisoner, but he refused to listen for a moment to the application after that which he had heard.

Dawson is, with Bishop, still held in Cambridge Jail for trial at the Autumn Assizes, on another indictment, charging him with poisoning two brood mares, the property of Mr. Northey, and a hack, belonging to Mr. Adams, of Royston, at Newmarket, in 1809. This is said to be a strong case, but it would be very imprudent to canvass that subject, as it will appear before a British Jury.

We understand from a passage in Mr. Kent's pamphlet, that Bishop, during the time he expected to have been tried with Dawson, made a voluntary and written confession of the whole of the nefarious conspiracy:

spiracy; he stated that he was to have had 500l. for the iniquitous work when completed, and a like sum was also to be paid to the prisoner from a certain person or persons, whose names cannot at present be disclosed to the public.

Since the above trial, the following letter has been published:

Saturday, March 14, 1812.

To the Editor of the Morning Herald.

Sir—My name appearing in the report inserted in the different newspapers of this day, of the trial of D. Dawson, for poisoning Horses at Newmarket, I beg, through your paper, to express my surprise how, and upon what grounds, Bishop, the witness, could possibly have mentioned me as being in the most remote degree implicated in that villainous act. To attempt any reply to the statement he is alleged to have made, would, I conceive, be premature, until I have obtained a full and correct report of the evidence he gave on the trial, so far as such evidence related to me. This I am using every exertion in my power to obtain, and have no doubt I shall be in possession of it in a very few days, when I most solemnly pledge myself to prove, by a plain narrative of facts, corroborated by such affidavits as I shall be enabled to procure, that I had not the smallest concern in, or even knowledge of, the crime for which Dawson was indicted. Meanwhile I entreat the public to suspend their judgment on the case.

Be assured, Sir, I hold the brutal act of poisoning the horses, and the motives that led to it, whatever they might be, in as much abhorrence as any man in the kingdom: and you will form some idea of my astonishment, on reading the report of the trial, when I declare I never saw Bishop, the witness, but once in my life, when he obtruded himself upon me, and that several months after the infamous transaction in question; I then only saw him for a few minutes; nor had I previously ever heard his name mentioned.—I am, Sir, your obedient, humble servant,

L. Trist.

GILBERT versus SYKES.

Action tried at the York Assizes, before Sir A. Thomson, Knt. and a Special Jury.

THIS was an action brought by the Rev. Robert Gilbert against Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, Bart. M. P. to recover a sum of money won on a bet made in 1802, the nature of which was, that the plaintiff, on paying defendant 100gs. should receive from defendant one guinea per day, during the life of Napoleon Bonaparte.

The pleadings having been opened by Mr. Brougham,

Mr. Parke, the leading Counsel for the prosecution, stated the case to the Jury. He observed, that "from the difficulty he experienced in reaching the place where he then stood, and the numerous assemblage he witnessed upon the present occasion, he supposed much expectation and interest had been excited by this cause; but he did not know why, and so far as depended upon himself, those expectations would be grievously disappointed. He should merely state the case with very few observations. Mr. Parke here touched upon the facts of the case, which would would be stated by the testimony of the respective witnesses.

"Gentlemen of the Jury, this was a bet made upon the LIFE of Bonaparte; the condition of which was, that the plaintiff, on paying one hundred guineas, should receive one guinea per day so long as Bonaparte should live. The contract had been performed on the part of the plaintiff; and for a considerable period (near three years) the defendant continued to pay the stipulated sum. It perhaps might be objected, that wagers on the lives of men were immoral: but the laws of England support these wagers; and in a most flagrant case, (for if ever there was an immoral wager, that was was one) he meant the case of the Duke of Queensberry, then Earl of March, and Mr. Pickard, who, to use the jockey phrase, run the lives of their respective fathers against each other; or, in other words, bet a considerable wager as to whom died the first, and yet this wager was supported by Lord Mansfield, who was a great and profound lawyer. But it might be further objected, that Napoleon Bonaparte was an alien enemy, and that from this circumstance the wager was void, on the ground of public policy.—But he recollected a case which occurred in the Protectorate of Oliver Cromwell, when a wager was laid that Charles Stuart, then an exile, would be King of England within a year; and this wager was also supported, though it was indecorous with respect to the government then existing; for though Cromwell was an usurper, he was de facto, though not de jure, Governor of this country.—Having stated what he had, he should now call his witnesses, and if he succeeded in proving the wager, he should be entitled to a verdict in favour of his client."

The Rev. William Croft stated, that he dined at Sir Mark Masterman Sykes's on a Saturday in 1802, he could not recollect the precise time, when Mr. Foulis, Mr. Croxton, Mr. Gilbert, Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, and witness, were present. After the cloth was removed, politics became the subject of conversation; many remarks were made on the critical situation of Bonaparte at that time, as it respected his personal danger: some of the company expressed an opinion that attempts would be made to assassinate him. Sir Mark Masterman Sykes expressed himself of this opinion, and that he considered his life in such great danger, that he would venture to receive one hundred guineas, to pay a guinea per day during the life of Bonaparte; Mr. Gilbert immediately said, "Will you, Sir Mark! done!"—Sir Mark appeared surprized and rather displeased that the offer should be so hastily accepted; there was then a general cry of "no bet." Mr. Gilbert, perceiving the general displeasure that was expressed at the bet, said to Sir Mark, "If you will say you will be obliged to me, you may be off." Sir Mark replied, "that he would not ask any favour, or make any concession, at his own table, or in his own house." The Rev. Gentleman does not recollect that any thing further was said upon the subject; it was not renewed whilst he staid. He has never had any conversation with Sir Mark about the wager, nor has he heard, in the presence of Sir Mark, any conversation respecting it. After the bet was made, Sir Mark Sykes requested the witness to call upon Mr. Gilbert, bert, and say, that he would give him 500l. to have the bet cancelled; Mr. Gilbert said he would refer it to the Jockey Club. This was soon after the wager was made.

On the cross-examination of the Rev. Mr. Croft, by Mr. Topping, he stated that Mr. Gilbert was rector of Settrington, a living of more than 1000l. per annum, but worth, perhaps, 1200l. or 1300l. He is rector of a parish, and has a cure of souls.—Being asked if the Reverend Gentleman had not been invited to partake of a haunch of venison, he stated he could not then recollect what the dinner consisted of. Lady Sykes was present. It was not immediately after the cloth was removed. Did not drink water to their dinner; and could not say that Sir Mark Masterman Sykes was remarkable for his abstemiousness. The glass was circulated very freely. A political discussion took place, in which the affairs of the Continent were introduced. The bet did not relate to the bodily state of Napoleon Bonaparte's health, but to his critical situation, in which attempts might be made to assassinate him. It was the general opinion of the company that his life was in danger; but the gentleman who was so attached to the Jockey Club, thought Bonaparte was in no danger; but Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, who has no taint of disloyalty in him, said, if any person would advance him an hundred guineas he would give a guinea per day so long as he lived. The Reverend Divine said Done! Done! in the true language of the Newmarket Jockeys. Sir Mark Masterman Sykes seemed much surprised and displeased, which he evinced by his countenance more than by words. The company felt but one common sentiment, that it was a very improper act, and expressed their displeasure at it; upon which Mr. Gilbert replied, "if you will say that you are obliged to me, it shall be off." Sir Mark did not feel that he could say that; he said, "he would not make any concession at his own table, or in his own house." Witness did not think Sir Mark made the proposal seriously, or with a design of making such a bet. Mr. Topping inquired if the Rev. Mr. Gilbert did not say, when the witness applied to him on the subject, "it is so numbered in the bond:" the proposal was a friendly one for peace; the witness told Mr. Gilbert "that he came with this proposal to make an end of the matter." Mr. Topping asked if the Reverend Gentleman did not choose to refer it to his friends, the Gentlemen composing the Jockey Club? Witness replied, yes. Witness did not say he came to make a proposal of peace: merely said, that he came to offer 500l. to do away with the bet.

John Robert Foulis, Esq. stated that he recollected dining with Sir Mark Masterman Sykes about ten years ago; there was present Mr. Croft and the other gentlemen mentioned by the last witness. After the ladies had retired, the conversation turned upon the precarious situation of Napoleon Bonaparte; some gentlemen thought his life in danger, and others not. Mr. Gilbert was of the latter opinion. Sir Mark M. Sykes expressed his sentiments to the contrary, and stated "if any person would advance him 100 guineas, he would return one guinea per day during Napoleon's life." Mr. Gilbert immediately said, "done with you, Sir M. M. Sykes, I'll take you." Mr. Gilbert also said, "if Sir M. M. Sykes would ask him as a favour to let him off, he would." Sir Mark was very much hurt, and said, "No, he would not submit to ask a favour of Mr. Gilbert at his own table." Does not recollect Sir Mark saying any thing more upon the subject. Has frequently seen Sir Mark since, but does not recollect him mentioning the bet; nor does he, of his own knowledge, know of any money having been paid.

Sir

Mr. Foulis, in his cross-examination by Mr. Scarlett, said, that the company remained some time after the ladies retired, and believes the bottle had gone round pretty freely. Did not understand that Sir Mark had any serious design to propose such a bet. Witness was much surprized at the offer. The exclamation of "no bet" was made; and Mr. Gilbert said, "done!" Sir Mark seemed much hurt at being taken up so hastily. Mr. Gilbert said "if you will submit I'll let you off." Sir Mark replied as before stated.—Witness is Sir M. M. Sykes's brother-in-law.

On his re-examination by Mr. Brougham, he did not mean to represent the company as being drunk; they were in possession of their sober senses, and Sir Mark also. The plaintiff made the proposal to Sir Mark for the bet to be void, in rather an insolent manner; his words were, "if you will ask me as a favour I will let you off." [A letter was shewn, which he acknowledged to be Sir M. M. Sykes's hand-writing.]

Benjamin Boyes stated, that he formerly lived with Mr. Gilbert, and was sent with a letter to Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, but did not know the contents, or whether it was sealed or folded up in his presence; he gave it to Sir Mark's servant, but does not know his name. Witness was afterwards sent to Mr. Walker's, brewer and banker, Malton, for some money for Mr. Gilbert, and received 100 guineas. On his return from Malton, he believes that the 100 guineas were put into a letter which was sent to Sir Mark, and which, he thinks, he folded up himself.—Witness received from Lady Sykes's Steward (Thomas Wales), various sums of money for the use of Mr. Gilbert; he has received seven guineas at a time, at different periods, but cannot say how much. A book was shewn to the witness, in which the payments were entered by him, and from this he was desired to refresh his memory. After considerable hesitation, he said the different sums received amounted to between 400l. and 500l. from which the property-tax had been deducted. Witness sometimes wrote letters for Mr. Gilbert to his butcher, taylor, shoe-maker, &c. &c. but did not write his confidential ones. Mr. Walker, the banker, did not inclose the 100 guineas in an envelope, but gave them to the witness. He also said he did not know what the letter for Sir Mark Masterman Sykes contained, but believed there was money in it; he received a letter in return, from Sir Mark, which was proved to be the hand-writing of Sir Mark.—The letter was then read—

"Sir Mark Masterman Sykes's "compliments to Mr. Gilbert, and "has received the money safe.

"Sledmere-house, Monday night."

Another letter, dated "Settrington," was then read—

"Sir Mark Masterman Sykes's "compliments to Mr. Gilbert, and "has sent some money—Sir Mark "Master-

"Masterman Sykes desires to "know how Mr. Gilbert will re-"ceive the money during his ab-"sence, and whether or not he will "have it paid into the bank at "Malton."

The following witness was called to prove that Napoleon Bonaparte was living at the commencement of this action:—Mr. Anderson is a Messenger in the office of the American Consul, and has seen Napoleon Bonaparte repeatedly. He left Paris on the 30th of January in the present year, charged with dispatches to the American Charge d'Affaires at London; had seen Bonaparte in January or December last; cannot say whether he then saw him more than once, when he was reviewing his troops at the Thuilleries: he was mounted on a white charger, but was too far from him to recognise his features.

This witness was cross-examined by Mr. Scarlett, who asked him how he could be positive that it was Bonaparte, as he seemed to be unable to distinguish any thing but a white horse; witness replied that it was him, but that it was not easy to approach while he was reviewing 30,000 troops; he believes that he also passed him when travelling rapidly in his carriage, from an hunting excursion, and was present when Napoleon Bonaparte made his grand entrance into Amsterdam in October last, being not more than the distance of the table from him. Witness knows his person, and can distinguish him from his brothers, having seen them all, except Lucien Bonaparte; likewise his brother Joseph, King of Spain, as he is in that country denominated (a laugh), also King Louis, and Jerome, King of Westphalia. Witness was asked several questions as to his health, when he replied, with peculiar energy, "I am very sorry to inform you, that he will probably live thirty or forty years longer; when I saw him near five years since (crowned Emperor of France), he had an oval Italian face, but is now grown fat, and as good-looking, and quite as en bon point as yourself (meaning Mr. Scarlett). I repeatedly saw him and his lady in a barge, during their stay at Amsterdam, and subsequent to his grand military entrée into that city."

Mr. Topping then rose.—"I am happy to have it in my power to say that which my friend could not, that I have the honour to be Counsel for the defendant. My learned friend has spoken of the particular interest excited by this cause, as if it was expected to call forth extraordinary bursts of eloquence. I know that the eloquence of my learned friend, whose powers and abilities no man admires more than I do, has drawn together admiring crowds, but which has never been increased by any expectations entertained of my own, by a single individual. I am a plain, blunt man, and have an unvarnished tale to tell you. The plaintiff who now seeks to recover at your hands the penalty numbered in his bond, is a clergyman of the established church, a rector of an extensive parish, and who has a cure of souls. I have frequently witnessed the eloquence of my learned friend with feelings of admiration, but I never admired his abilities, so much as I now admire his silence on this occasion. He has not informed you of the sum sought to be recovered by this action, though it is stated in the pleadings, but you shall hear this from me. I shall therefore inform you, the sum he has already received, amounts to nine hundred and seventy pounds, paid by the defendant in consequence of an unguarded expression, used in a moment of jollity, at his own table, amongst those whom he imagined his friends; and in addition to this, the plaintiff seeks to recover, by your verdict, the further sum of two thousand two hundred and ninety-six pounds seven shillings.— This is what this worthy clergyman, this ornament of the established church, now seeks, through your means, to obtain from the defendant. What motives have influenced the plaintiff to forbear to sue for six or seven years I cannot conjecture; perhaps it was some compunctious visitings of conscience, some remonstrances of that inward monitor, or it may be some regard to the sacred character of his profession; but, whatever were the motives, they have ceased to operate, and he now comes forth, like the Jew in the play, to crave the penalty numbered in his bond. I remember a saying of Lord Ellenborough, which I much admired, 'that it would be well for some persons, before they came into Court, to inquire, if there is not something more valuable than money;' but there are persons who have so little value and feeling for character, that if you were to put five shillings in one scale and character in the other, they would run away with the money, and leave character to kick the beam.

"Gentlemen, I was quite surprised, nay astonished, when I found the plaintiff was a clergyman; but he cannot say with the apothecary in Romeo and Juliet, 'my poverty, and not my will, consents. This Rector having a cure of souls, and minister of an extensive parish, with a benefice of fourteen hundred pounds per annum, was admitted to the society of honourable men, and was on the present occasion invited to meet a party of friends at Sir M. M. Sykes's; after the ladies had retired, and the glass had been circulated, with that freedom which belongs to the liberal character of the worthy Baronet, the conversation turned upon politics; this very naturally introduced the name of Bonaparte, and an argument took place respecting the precarious and critical situation in which this extraordinary personage was placed. There is, unfortunately, in this country, much of party spirit; every man thinks upon politics for himself; and God forbid that any should wish to restrain this freedom on political subjects. Not that he meant that this freedom should not extend to other subjects; but politics are what we are now concerned with. It seemed to be the general opinion of the company that Bonaparte was in considerable personal danger; but from this opinion the Rev. Clergyman dissented; and Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, in the warmth of the moment, exclaimed, 'I would venture to receive one hundred guineas to pay one guinea a day during the life of Bonaparte;' this expression was hastily caught at, and this Clergyman, in the language of any common five-guinea better on a race-course, assailed him with, 'Will you Sir Mark, I'll take you—done!' You have heard, gentlemen, that there was an immediate exclamation of 'no bet, no bet;' and that there was but one common feeling on the occasion.— When Mr. Gilbert observed the disapprobation with which his acceptance of Sir Mark's offer was received, he said, 'if you will submit to ask it as a favour you may be off;' that is, if you Sir Mark, in your own house, and at the head of your own table, will submit to acknowledge a pecuniary obligation to a man who has caught at a hasty expression, which was never meant nor understood to be a serious offer, why then, upon your making this submission, (asking pardon much in the same way as is done in newspapers), I will let you off. But Sir M. M. Sykes felt that he could not lay himself under a pecuniary obligation to a person who had entrapped him in consequence of a hasty expression. You have been informed that the company soon after separated. I shall only say, that if this had happened in my presence, I should have buttoned my breeches pocket, taken hat and stick, and walked out of the room as fast as my legs would carry me.

"We learn from the witness who has so extraordinary a memory, (Mr. Boyes) that on the day but one following on Monday morning, he sends the one hundred guineas to Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, inclosed in a letter, to which, no doubt, he expected an answer would be returned which would oblige Sir Mark either to confess himself under a pecuniary obligation, or fix him with the wager. Sir Mark acknowledged the receipt of the one hundred guineas, and the Rev. Gentleman for some time received the money, the penalty of the bond, in weekly payments of seven guineas, but which afterwards got to larger payments. His client, who was a most honourable man, wishing to put an end to a matter, which had originated in a mere casual expression, in an amicable manner, sent a friend, a gentleman you have just heard, with a proposal of peace, to offer him the sum of five hundred pounds to put an end to the dispute. How did the Rev. Gentleman, this minister of peace, receive this offer? Might it not have been expected that he would have readily acceded to the proposal, or at least that he would have referred it to some common friend to settle the matter between them? but this was not his conduct. In the true spirit of done and done he would refer the matter to the Jockey-Club; for my part I know none of the members of the Jockey-Club, and I hope I never shall. Sir Mark Masterman Sykes continued to pay this guinea per day a considerable time, but at length, probably thinking he had paid enough for a foolish expression, he declined making any further payments; and the plaintiff rests upon his oars for five or six years, and forbore to enforce his claim. My client naturally thought that Mr. Gilbert was satisfied with the money he had received, and he should hear no more of the matter, but in this expectation he was deceived. In January last an action was brought to recover the sum unpaid, and the observations I have hitherto made applied to the facts of the case, and I shall contend that under all the circumstances of the case, the proposal of Sir Mark was not meant as a serious bet, and if this is your opinion, I must be entitled to your verdict in favour of the defendant. But if you should think that this was a real wager, I shall submit, through you, to his Lordship, some observations on the law of the case. This cause differed materially from the cases cited by his learned friend; in that of 'March and Pickard' there was nothing nothing immoral; they were two necessitous young men, and the effect of the wager was merely this, 'If your father dies before mine, you shall help me; if mine dies the first, I will help you;' and in the other case, there was a mere matter of fact concerned, whether Charles Stuart should, at a stipulated time, be in possession of the Crown of this Kingdom. But in the case now before us there may eventually be an interest revealed, inconsistent with the public safety. The idea of invasion is now generally laughed at, but sometimes these things which are laughed at become serious realities, and putting the case that Bonaparte should, at the head of his army, succeed in effecting a descent upon this country, it is clear that the plaintiff would have an interest in protecting that life, which every true subject and friend of his country would be interested in destroying; he would have an annuity of three hundred and sixty-five guineas per annum, depending upon the personal safety of this inveterate enemy of our country.

"O England!—model to thy inward greatness,
Like little body with a mighty heart—
What might'st thou do, that honour would thee do,
Were all thy children kind and natural!"

"I know not whether the Rev. Clergyman frequently attends the church, the doctrines of which teach us to pray for our enemies; but the plaintiff has a more cogent motive for being devout in this part of the service—an interest of three hundred and sixty-five guineas per year!

"Gentlemen, having thus laid before you what has occurred to me, both on the facts of the case and the law, I leave it in your hands, subject to the directions you will receive from his Lordship."

The Judge then proceeded to state the evidence to the Jury, with his observations upon it, leaving them to decide on the fact—Whether there was an intention of betting on the part of Sir Mark Masterman Sykes, and reserving the point of law.

The Jury, after a short consultation, found a verdict for the defendant.

WATER-DOG AND MALLARD.

TO face this page of our Magazine, we have placed another spirited Etching by Mr. Howitt, of The Water-Dog and Mallard.

EXTRAORDINARY SPEED.

ON Tuesday, the 10th instant, a party of gentlemen, for a considerable bet, set off from the George Inn, at Portsmouth, in Bellett's barouche-and-four, to reach London, a distance of 72 miles, in seven hours and three quarters; which, to the astonishment of both parties, was accomplished in five hours and thirty-one minutes, being two hours and fourteen minutes less than the given time; averaging about fourteen miles an hour. The following is a statement of the distance, and places of changing horses:—Portsmouth to Horndean, 10 miles, 53 minutes; Petersfield, 8 miles, 32 minutes; Liphook, 8 miles, 41 minutes; Godalming, 12 miles, 54 minutes; Ripley, 10 miles, 47 minutes; Kingston, 12 miles, 45 minutes; Hyde-Park-Corner, 12 miles, 49 minutes; changing horses 10 minutes.—331 minutes.

FEAST

FEAST OF WIT.

MODERN TIMES.—A female servant, in offering herself for hire to a lady in Canterbury, after the usual inquiries, said there was one thing she had forgot to mention, which was, that she might be permitted to go out two evenings in the week to practise dancing ! ! !—In consequence of the above paragraph, the following was sent, in reply to the Editor of the newspaper in which it appeared :—"A Correspondent wishes to inform the servant of 'MODERN TIMES,' that if she will apply to a certain gentleman in Canterbury, she will hear of a situation that will be extremely convenient to her; for instead of going out to practise dancing, she will find that the gentleman always has boiled mutton twice a week, consequently she can cut capers at home."

ENGLISH BULL.—A Morning Paper of March 9, contained the following :—"The new heir to the throne of the Grand Signior has been CHRISTENED Amurath !"

WHEN Brennan, the noted highwayman, was taken in the south of Ireland some months ago, curiosity drew numbers to the gaol, to see the man loaded with irons, who had long been a terror to the country; among others was a banker, whose notes at that time were not held in the highest estimation, who assured the prisoner that he was very glad to see him there at last. Brennan, looking up, replied, "Ah, Sir, I did not expect that from you—indeed I did not; for you well know, that, when all the country refused your notes—I took them."

THE Irish Chief of the Common Pleas, Lord Norbury, is not less famous for his legal attainments than his skill in farming, and having of course a due respect for manure, is often observed quite early in the morning superintending the scrapings of the roads, a mine of wealth to the experienced agriculturist. A celebrated physician happened to pass by while this operation was going forward, to whom his Lordship, in his usual condescending way, ejaculated—"Well, Doctor, you see I am repairing your roads for you !"—"Yes, my Lord," replies the Doctor, "I see you are paring and repairing."

OPPOSITION PLEASANTRY.

A Printer's Pun.

Ho! Tommy, bawl'd Type to a brother in Trade,
The Ministry are to be changed, it is said;
That's good, replied Tom, but it better would be,
For a trifling erratum—What?—dele the c.

A YOUNG lady, who had been rather severely interrogated by an ill-tempered Counsel, observed, on leaving the witness-box, that she never before so fully understood what was meant by cross-examination.

IN a fashionable company lately, where a lady, under noble protection, was styled the Lady Deputy, one one present observed, that it would be more appropriate if she were termed the Lady Vice.

Among some late births, it was somewhat humourously stated, that Mrs. Crib, the wife of the celebrated Pugilist, had been delivered of a fine thumping child.

In the window of a poulterer's shop at Chichester, a paper was lately posted, literally couched as follows:—" Dukes and Fools killed here." It may be necessary to add, that the writing was equal to the orthography.

ON THE INCREASE OF BUILDINGS NEAR LONDON.

You'll observe, we're extending on every side,
Along and across, up and down, far and wide,
New streets, places, squares, rise, and houses so thick,
That soon the four counties they'll cover with brick.
'Twill be vastly convenient, I cannot but own,
When Hampstead's united to Mary-le-bone:
As Knightsbridge and Kensington seem to be spreading
Their arms to embrace, and to travel to Reading;
While Shoreditch and Mile-end are leisurely stepping
A pleasant foot-pace to Enfield and Epping;
The quick-raised erections of Southwark and Surrey,
To Dover and Guildford set out in a hurry.
But, as they've the rickets to terra, I pray,
They mayn't make some false steps by the way.

The following dialogue recently took place in a stage coach, between a respectable Member of the Society of Friends (well known in South Wales), and a fellow passenger, in consequence of the former soliciting subscriptions in aid of the Bible Society:—G. " I wonder at the confidence of you Quakers, in requesting aid for the distribution of a book in which, it is well known, you do not believe."—Q. " Aye—prove thy assertion, and particularize the charge in a single instance."—G. " Why, there is that foolish story of a little boy's killing a giant, by hitting him with a stone on the forehead."—Q. " Thy epithet proves thy own unbelief; but really if the Philistine's forehead was as soft as thine, I see nothing miraculous in the effort!"

ON A PALE LADY.

Whence comes it that in Clara's face,
The lily only has a place?
Is it, that the absent rose
Is gone to paint her husband's nose?

A few days ago, a complaint was made to an old gentleman in Ireland, in the 98th year of his age, that his youngest son, who is seventy, had taken improper liberties with a young woman in his neighbourhood; on which the father observed, that " his son was a giddy youth, and if he did not leave off his boyish pranks, he would cut him off to a shilling."

When Dr. Johnson courted Mrs. Potter, whom he afterwards married, he told her, " that he was of mean extraction; that he had no money; and that he had an uncle hanged!" The lady, by way of reducing herself to an equality with the Doctor, replied, " that she had no more money than himself: and that though she had not a relation hanged, she had fifty who deserved hanging." And thus was accomplished this very curious amour.

SPORTING INTELLIGENCE.

A Pack of hounds were lately shipped for Lisbon, which on their landing will immediately proceed to head-quarters. These will make the fourth pack which the British officers will have for their amusement. There are abundance of foxes in Portugal, and excellent shooting. There have also been recently shipped a variety of matters, necessary for a theatre, as the officers amuse themselves occasionally with private theatricals, balls, and other amusements, as if it were a period of profound peace.

On Monday, the 2d instant, the Finden hounds (Sussex) unkennelled a fox near Amberley, which afforded a most excellent chase of an hour and twenty minutes, when reynard dropped his brush, and surrendered, at discretion, to his keen but merciless pursuers, who ran in to him, in a very gallant style.

On Tuesday, the 3d inst. the Earl of Derby turned out a fine deer near Wickham, in Kent, which, after a hard run of four hours, was taken in the Thames, near Woolwich.

The Duke of Rutland's hounds had an extraordinary run on Thursday the 12th inst. They found at Spanby-gorse, whence they ran into Horbling lordship; there reynard doubled back again to Spanby, thence to Scredington, Aswarby Thorns, Quarrington, Sleaford, Heckington, Helpringham, Great and Little Hale, Swaton, Horbling, and Bridge-end, back to Horbling meadows, Billingborough, Sempringham, Birthorpe, Pointon Cottage, Laughton, Aslackby Wood, Kirkby, Bulby, and the hounds were whipped off at Grimsthorpe. There was not a horse that was not completely done up; they were left in all directions; their riders, much to their credit, groomed them at the different haystacks. Mr. Forrester, Mr. Grosvenor, and another gentleman, were the only red-coats who witnessed the whipping-off of the hounds. The chase was at least twenty-five miles—through a country of the strongest kind, and with leaping of the most tremendous description.

Tuesday, the 25th ult. the Perching hounds (Sussex) roused a remarkably fine buck on St. Leonard's Forest, and run him in a very gallant style four hours and a half, when the noble animal fell a victim to his staunch pursuers, near the Norfolk Arms Inn, on that extensive forest. More than forty horsemen were in the field, and Mr. Thomas Marchant, with a few others, were close in at the death. Although the above was not one of the original red deer with which St. Leonard's Forest, within these fifty years, was abundantly stocked, it had obtained, from its uncontrolable range, and from its manner of procuring food, a degree of strength and agility very superior to the generality of deer confined within the limits of a park; and of course afforded additional zest to those who were fortunate enough to join in the chase.

Extract

Extract of a letter from Brighton, dated March 3.—"Our resident sportsmen were in the enjoyment of some brisk exercise in the field yesterday. After a chase of considerable interest and length, puss, from the Northern Downs, took a southerly direction along the hills which skirt this town to the east, eventually entered Edward-street, and, in an exhausted state, endeavoured to obtain shelter from farther pursuit by entering a pig-stye in that neighbourhood. A person, however, near the spot, who beheld the panting animal in her distress, followed her to her retreat, killed her, and conveyed her away. The hariers, in the interim, were in high scent and full cry, affording, with a numerous field of sportsmen, a pleasing picture, from the North Steyne and Level, of animated nature, as they musically passed along the slope of the fronting downs. On reaching the pig-stye, both sportsmen and dogs were at fault, and some little confusion ensued, but the sportsmen ultimately discovered the cause of it, and, as the offending individual is not unknown, a prosecution, it is understood, will forthwith be commenced against him."

Lord Rancliff's fox cover at Kenworth, seven miles from Nottingham, caught fire on Wednesday evening, the 11th inst. The blaze was discernible at the distance of ten miles.

An extraordinary instance of swiftness lately took place in coursing a hare at Poynton, Lincolnshire; a hare was started by three greyhounds, which run fifteen minutes and fifty-five seconds, in the most astonishing stile, when she was killed. The distance run, in that short period, it is supposed was six miles.

The following is a List of Game, &c. shot this season, upon the Manor of Riddlesworth, in Norfolk, the residence of Thomas Thornhill, Esq.; hares, 574; partridges, 725; pheasants, 701; rabbits, 492; snipes, 49; woodcocks, 6; total, 2548. About 3000 rabbits have been killed by the keepers, with nets, props, &c.

A Gormandizer.—On Saturday, the 15th instant, one Kinchington, who resides at Hungerford, near Fording-bridge, Hants, undertook to eat four dozen mutton pies, and drink two quarts of strong beer, in forty minutes. He did not undertake this feat for any large sum, but if he compleated his task within the given time, he was to have the pies and beer gratis; if not, to pay for them himself. When he had devoured all the pies but three, he became rather sick; however, not intimidated by this trifling interruption, he performed his task ten minutes within the time, and after drinking two additional pints of beer, went home comfortably to bed. The pies weighed six pounds.

We understand there are nineteen Subscribers for the Cup at the Salisbury Meeting, and much sport is consequently expected.

Mr. Bell's ch. c. Young Warter, 4 yrs old, 8st. . . . . . . 3 dis

Young Warter bolted the first heat, but saved his distance; he also bolted the second heat, and was distanced, otherwise he would have won easy.

Wednesday—Fifty Pounds for all ages.—4-mile heats.

Mr. Bell's ch. colt, Young Warter, by Warter, 4 yrs old, 7st. 10lb. 2 1 1
Mr. Pratt's br. h. Gamecock, 5 yrs old, 8st. 6lb. 1 2 2

This was one of the finest races ever run. The first heat was won by two lengths; the second and third heats were severely contested, and won by the neck and head.

The Mostyn Hunt Races took place on Cottisford Heath, on Wednesday, March 18, when the Gold Cup, of 100gs. value, for horses, the property of Members of Sir T. Mostyn's hunt, was won by Mr. Pierrepoint's Birdlime, beating Mr. Drake's Pewet, and Mr. William's Jackides.—50gs. the gift of John Harrison, Esq. was won by Mr. Drake's Aylesbury.—Handicap Sweepstakes, of 10gs each, was won by Mr. Cope's Turtle, beating Sir T. Mostyn's Artichoke, Mr. Slater's Catalani, Mr. Lloyd's Woodman, and Mr. Harrison's Tag; 2 to 1 on Turtle.—A cup, value 10gs. and 40gs. in specie, given by Members of the hunt, was won by Mr. Ivens's br. g. by Woodpecker or Doubtful, beating Mr. Stevens's br. g. Mr. Hopcroft's Nimble, Mr. Hitchcock's Phosphorus, and Mr. T. Reynolds's b. g. by No Pretender.

Pigeon Shooting.—Thursday, the 5th, a match at twenty-one birds took place on Hounslow-heath, betwixt a gentleman of the name of Adkins and William Minton, keeper to a gentleman in Berkshire. The former killed seventeen birds, missed one, and lost three out of bounds. The keeper killed sixteen, and hit the other five, two of which fell within a few yards of the boundary, and by which he lost the match.

A very numerous and fashionable party assembled on Tuesday, the the 17th instant, at Blake's Hotel, Upper Exbury, Wilts, to witness a match of pigeon shooting, which took place between three of Beaulieu, against three of Fawley and Exbury, which, after some very good shooting, was decided in favour of the latter.

PEDESTRIANISM.—On Thursday, March 19, —— Sutton, a painter, in the neighbourhood of Eastcheap, for a wager of 5l. undertook to go on foot from London-bridge to Shooter's-hill, and back again, in two hours, distance sixteen miles, which he completed three minutes within the time.

ONE day this month, for a wager of 5l. P. Jones, of Folkstone, undertook to walk on Swingfield Minnis, twenty miles in four hours, which, notwithstanding the unfavourableness of the weather, he performed fifteen minutes less than the given time. The concourse of people which flocked to see the performance was great, and though the task was undertaken for so trifling a sum, yet it afforded a spacious field for adventurers.

MR. Aiken, the pedestrian, performed a mile and a half within eight minutes, on Wednesday, the 4th instant, at Ashford, for a wager of one hundred guineas. Time the favourite.

ON Saturday, the 8th, as Lord Thurlow's gamekeeper was going his rounds on Ashfield Manor, Sussex, he was furiously assaulted by three men with bludgeons, who sprung on him, and after knocking him down severely beat him; on his calling out for help, they all ran off towards Ashfield.

ON the 1st of March, the gamekeeper at Glynn, Cornwall, observed two birds on the wing, engaged in desperate combat. They fell to the ground so, and had all their faculties so completely absorbed in the affair, as to suffer him to catch both of them. They proved to be a hawk and a jay.

WE have been informed of a singular instance of instinct in the common sparrow. A few days ago a sparrow was remarked to fly several times with food in her mouth, into a hole in an old wall. The curiosity of the person observing it, was excited to ascertain the cause; and, ascending to the place with a ladder, he found there a full grown bird of the summer's brood, which had been accidentally entangled, by one leg, in such a manner as not to be able to escape. Thus fettered, the old birds had not forsaken their unfortunate offspring, but had continued to feed and support it in its confinement, even for so many months after all the other individuals of the same brood had taken their flight.

PUGILISM.—When the training given to Crib by Captain Barclay is mentioned, "the saddle should be set upon the right horse." The real fact is, the whole secret and practice were what the Captain had experienced himself from Smith of Owston, who trained him when he ran his match against time near Barnby-moor; and is really Yorkshire training. The same training was given to Beale, not long ago, when he beat Abraham Wood four miles over Knavesmire, and is unquestionably the best system known.

JOHN Page, servant to the pugilists, lists, Messrs. Dogherty and Molineux, is committed to take his trial at Portsmouth next Sessions, for picking the pocket of Mr. Green, publican, of Gosport, of a pocket-book, containing seven pounds. The theft took place at a sparring exhibition, at which Page was employed to snuff the candles. Page and Green afterwards accidentally met at the Little Fountain public-house, when Page laid a bet, of which Green was made the holder—when the latter was agreeably surprised in recognising a 2l. note, part of his lost property. The pocket book was found under the table, after Page had been searched.

On Monday, the 16th inst. an inquisition was taken at the Guildhall, Northampton, before the Coroner, upon the body of William Church, of Bozeat, who on the preceding Monday, in consequence of a quarrel with one Benjamin Woodruff, a currier, adjourned with him to Cow-meadow, to decide the contest, accompanied by a great number of people. At their first setting to, Church received a heavy blow on the neck from his antagonist, which knocked him down with great violence, and he laid upon the ground two or three minutes; he was raised up, but on being left to himself, fell down again; afterwards, however, he fought two or three rounds, but never spoke, and was carried from the ground in a state of insensibility to the General Infirmary, where he languished till the Saturday, when he died.—Verdict, Manslaughter.

A manly contested pitched battle took place on Tuesday, the 25th ult. at Westwood Common, near Henley, betwixt young Crabbe, nephew of the formidable bruiser of that name, belonging to the old school, and Sam Farren, a smith, for a stake of forty guineas, and a purse of 20l. Crabbe weighed under twelve stone, and his antagonist twelve stone four. A very determined stand-up fight, which lasted fifty-six minutes, took place, when Farren became senseless by hits about the head, and from loss of blood he resigned the combat.

Checquers.——The Duke of Norfolk, in the House of Lords, lately, alluded to the following circumstance, which not being generally known, it may not be amiss to insert it.—The Earl of Warren, in Normandy, allied to William the Conqueror, who accompanied him in his conquest of this island, had afterwards an exclusive power of granting permission or licence to vend malt liquors; and to enable their agents to collect the consideration-money paid for it the more readily, the door-posts were painted in checquers, the arms of Warren, viz. "Checky, or, and azure," the practice of which has been handed down to the present day. The privilege of licensing is said to have been exercised by their descendant the Earl of Arundel, as late as the reign of Mary the First.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We have availed ourselves of part of the communication of our Correspondent at Stockton; the remainder, from being received late, became of no service.

The interesting trial of Dawson for poisoning the Horses at Newmarket, and of the action Gilbert v. Sykes, have occupied so much of the present Number, as to compel us to omit the Nominations of several Meetings in our Racing Department.

POETRY.

POETRY.

THE HIGH COURT OF DIANA.

To the Editor of the Sporting Magazine.

SIR,

IN your Magazine for October was a Song, which was promised to be continued, the non-compliance of which has caused the following attempt to carry on the subject by an Observer and Sportsman, who, as a friend to your publication, is anxious that so much good matter for rhyme should not be neglected. The writer of this intreats pardon of the Author of the Song alluded to, and begs Mr. Editor will suppress this, should the subject be continued and sent ere this be set for the press.

WINDSOR SPORTING

Continued.

THE dawn had long begun to peep,
O'er the high and fern-clad steep;
The misty morn foretold a day,
To lead the jovial band away.
The sun a hidden course did take,
Nor shone on hill, nor shone on brake;
No broken clouds in varied forms,
Told of dark'ning passing storms.
No wind did rattle in the dell,
The leaves to scatter as they fell;
For stilly came the southern breeze,
Dying in the winter'd trees.
No frozen dew-drop hung on blade,
Whit'ning all the chilling glade;
The ripp'ling waters still did glide,
Down the dale's uneven side;
For then no ice so glassy bright,
Told the charm that rul'd the night.
Oh! such a morn I fain wou'd sing,
As opens in the dawn of spring;
Enough of Winter's bracing time,
To feel the sport in season prime;
Enough of Spring's enlivening glow,
To make the pulse in torrents flow.
The rooks had left the covert wide,
Where they rock'd in peaceful ride;
The keepers all abroad were seen,
In their suits of glossy green;
In loop and tie, with eager bound,
Sprung their fleet and dauntless hound;
And pining for a madden'd race,
In their open, gallant chase.
The deer did browze upon the hill,
The cattle drank in pebbled rill;
The hare had left her clover treat,
And closely couch'd in rushy seat;
The ploughman's whistle cheer'd the vale,
The sheep-bell tinkled in the dale;
And every hum of rustic sound,
Flung a mingled din around;
For echo sweetly sent again
The noise from distant village plain;
Which e'en the clumsy hind forsook,
To view the road the hunters took;
And felt his spirits mounting high,
To hear the glorious bursting cry,
When from the hollow brake they view
Their victim dash the morning dew;
And fearless seek a home afar,
From the din of little war.
Now Windor streets in bustle rang,
To the steed's quick pacing clang;
No show of youth in armour bright,
Play'd upon the dazzled sight;
No tournament, or tilting field,
Brav'd a Knight a lance to wield;
To ride the ring, the gauntlet throw,
To raise ambition's noble glow;
No flying plume adorn'd a crest,
No spear was ready in its rest;
No wild enthusiastic joy,
Did their even minds employ;
No thought of who might win a prize,
Or bear a grace in lady's eyes.
Oh! what raptur'd time's gone bye,
When romantic fire was high;
When chivalry so wild and gay,
Led each youthful heart away,
To grace the lists for lady's fame,
Or raise the prowess of a name.

In

In buckskin neat, and jacket prim,
Came now each horseman on so trim;
And mark the stragglers far and wide,
Making for the covert side;
And mark the hounds, in spirits gay,
Coming on the winding way;
And mark the smile upon each face,
As they reach the resting place.
I will not sing each single elf,
With mind concentred all in self;
Just fit to climb in slipp'ry court,
Or shine the Don, in follies sport.
Good Manners once adorn'd the throng,
And led the merry chase along:
And taught each novice, curb'd each fool,
To keep within a proper rule:
But now, good Manners near forgot,
And all the charm is Mister B.
Lo, jolly B, with portly pride,
With his jackall at his side,
Who, jackall-like, attends his Lord,
For the leavings of his board;
And dare not hunt, nor dare he play,
But when the lion has his day.
And then in fawning, grinning grace,
He shines the hero of the chase;
Depending on his lion's nod,
To own a friend, to know a ——.
Now come the men of war, as rare
As ever sigh'd for lady fair;
As ever wielded brighten'd blade,
Or ever woo'd in myrtle shade;
As ever told of war's alarms,
Yet kept aloof from all its harms;
As ever tript in merry glee,
To the sound of minstrelsy;
As ever marshall'd troops amain,
Upon the heights of Winkfield plain.
But hold! no scandal fires my breast,
" Rest, perturbed spirit, rest."
Now Brewers, Lords, and Squires too,
And Ladies' simpers, simpers drew,
And pass'd their current " how d'ye do?"
And chat who last night led the ball,
Who sigh'd in bower, or shone in hall;
Who peerless bore each grace away,
And o'er each bosom held a sway
(Meet talk for heroes of the day).
Across from Cranbourn's high-built tow'r,
Comes the man of broken pow'r;
Yet still unshaken in his mind,
Casting thought and care behind;
His noble soul above the smart,
That rankles in the feeling heart;
And even now he dares to face,
E'en those he robb'd with little grace.
In act the first, Othello's play,
I'd have him read some leisure day,
Where damn'd Iago madly bawls,
And on Brabantio loudly calls;
" What, ho! Brabantio! What, ho!"
Enough—I still am scandal's foe.
Now threading through the bracken green,
Mark each hound with instinct keen;
See how they fling with gallant haste,
O'er the rough wide-spreading waste.
Now they double—steady, try,
Now I hear the stifled cry;
See old Chaunter how he bends,
Mark the aid old Trespass lends;
Now they jostle, now 'tis good,
She's crept away to yonder wood;
No haste—but let them pick it out,
Anon she'll hear the rattling shout.

Now rest we here, awhile I pray,
And hunt again a future day;
The chase we'll run together then,
And sing the feats of hounds and men;
At eve beside a blazing fire,
Ere the joys we rous'd expire;
And, hunting days, we'll cheerly ride
To the covert's meeting side;
And wisely ken, and wisely view,
All the crazy little crew;
And hang a mirror true as fair,
To shew the forms their merits bear.

THE TOPER'S APOLOGY.

YOU say I'm a drinker,
A toping free-thinker,
And why should I not, prythee tell me, fair Madam?
'Tis a clear demonstration,
That each sect and nation,
Had drinkers amongst them since old father Adam.

My mother's sweet nipple
First taught me to tipple,
And how can you let such a circumstance vex;
Or how can you blame me,
Indeed it can't shame me,
For it seems I first learnt it, my love, of your sex.

If you cannot endure me,
At least you may cure me,
And make me give over my thirst-begot sinning;
For believe me, fair creature,
In woman each feature
Possesses a power delightful and winning.

And as my sad errors,
The cause of thy terrors,
On the breast of a woman first made me their slave;

Dearest,

Dearest maid! on thy bosom,
'Twere best I should lose 'em,
And make their bright birth-place their beautiful grave!

PROLOGUE TO "THE HOUSE OF MORVILLE."

A New Drama, brought out this Month at the Lyceum Theatre.

LONG have the Painter's art, the Minstrel's strain,
In mists and storms plac'd Winter's rude domain—
A rugged Sire, in sullen state that shrouds
His lonely head amid the mountain clouds,
Where, crown'd with ice, and thron'd on hills of snow,
He marks with joy the wasted world below.

Errs not the hand that thus from Winter tears
The cordial smile that Winter only wears?
His social pow'r, from grove, and mead, and glen,
Draws to one point the scatter'd tribes of men;
Where, round the central flame, by turns prevail
Love's warbled lay, and Truth's instructive tale;
While feeling wakes Tradition's wildest rhyme,
Or mirth and music wing the steps of time.
The lonely grove may Summer's paths employ;
But Winter loves the hour of social joy—
The choral song, the dance's mingling maze,
The lay that breathes the tale of ancient days,
The scenes that man's reflected picture give,
And bid the forms of parted ages live.

Oft have our eyes beheld the reverend sire
Warming his aged veins by Shakespeare's fire;
Here, in gay robes, the side of beauty grace—(Boxes);
Here sit entrench'd, in critic pride of place—(Pit);
Or, 'mid yon towering cloud, dim-thron'd on high—(Gallery),
With mimic storms convulse our painted sky.

When here compacted numbers mark unfurl'd
The changeful scenes of this our mirror'd world,
And, by one common impulse sway'd the while,
Pour the same tear, or catch the gen'ral smile,
Who will not then the social charm confess,
Or say that Winter wears no genial dress?
What though his hand a leafless sceptre bears,
Though round his brow a crown of ice he wears,
Wreathes not the Muse, its frozen gems between,
Her cheerful laurel's everlasting green?

Our Bard to-night aspires, with wild design,
One ivy sprig around that crown to twine;
One wreath, which late, with trembling hope, he tore,
From feudal walls, and fallen towers of yore.
Oh! may its leaves escape your colder frown,
And bloom their hour on Winter's icy crown!
And should their spell one tear from beauty gain,
Or smooth the wrinkle from the cheeks of pain;
Should pity dwell on one congenial scene,
Not idly spent his studious hour has been,
Nor we, in vain, our duteous task pursue,
Whose only hope is—that of pleasing you.

ELEGY,

On a favourite Dog who died, aged Ten Years.

BENEATH this turf, consign'd to dust,
A favourite dog is laid;
Who ever faithful, true, and just,
The debt of nature paid.
Bred up with care from early youth,
Poor TOTT was much attach'd,

And

And ever with the greatest truth,
His Master's int'rest watch'd.
For ten long years this canine friend,
To please his Mistress tried;
And ever faithful to the end,
By all lamented, died!
In youth, by sleeping babes he'd lay,
To keep them from all harm;
And if a stranger pass'd that way,
Would give a quick alarm.
No tempting bribe could ever make,
Poor TOTT betray his trust;
The interest of his friends forsake,
Or do a thing unjust.
Whatever qualities are priz'd,
In canine race had he,
And from whate'er should be despis'd,
Poor TOTTLE! he was free.
Then let all false, pretended friends,
From TOTT example take;
And ne'er to serve their private ends,
The bonds of friendship break.

BRIGHTONIENSIS.

Brighton, March 5, 1812.

THE MONTH OF MARCH IN SCOTLAND.

By the late MR. GRAHAME.

THE ravaged fields, waste, colourless, and bleak,
Retreating Winter leaves, with angry frown,
And ling'ring on the distant snow-streak'd hills,
Displays the motly remnants of his reign.

With shoulder'd spade, the labourer to the field
Hies, joyful that the softened glebe gives leave
To toil; no more his children cry for bread,
Or, shivering, croud around the scanty fire:
No more he's doom'd, reluctant, to receive
The pittance, which the rich man proudly gives,
Who, when he gives, thinks heaven itself obliged.
Vain man! think not there's merit in the boon,
If, quitting not one comfort, not one joy,
The sparkling wine still circles round thy board,
Thy hearth still blazes, and the sounding strings,
Blent with the voice symphonious, charm thine ear.

The redbreast now, at morn, resumes his song,
And larks, high soaring, wing their spiral flight,
While the light-hearted ploughboys singing, blythe,
"The broom, the bonny broom of Cowdenknows," Fills with delight the wandering townsman's ear;
May be, tho' carrolled rude in artless guise,
Sad Floddenfield, of Scotia's lays most sweet,
Most mournful, dims, with starting tear, his eye.
Nor silent are the upland leas; cheerily
The partridge now her tuneless call repeats,
Or, bursting unexpected from the brake,
Startles the milk-maid singing o'er the ridge.
Nor silent are the chilly, leafless woods;
The thrush's note is heard amid the grove,
Soon as the primrose, from the withered leaves,
Smiling, looks out: Rash floweret! oft betrayed
By summer-seeming days, to venture forth
Thy tender form—the killing northern blast,
Will wrap thee lifeless in a hoar-frost shroud!

EXTEMPORE,

By a very Old Bachelor, on being solicited in Marriage by a very Old Maid.

ONCE am'rous fires
And young desires
Had fill'd my glowing breast;
Now hoary age
Chills Cupid's rage,
And grants an hour of rest.

On the verge of life
To take a wife
Would silly dotage shew;
The marriage bands
To cripple hands
Would be protracted woe.
